Excellent Cast Supports Star In "The Fear Woman"

Milton Sills and Beverly Travers in New Pauline Frederick Picture at Imperial.

Capital acting opportunities are offered not only Pauline Frederick but every one associated with her in "The Fear Woman," newest of her Goldwyn pictures, which is now on at the Imperial Theatre. The star herself is seen in a role of uncommon power and appeal as Helen Winthrop, a girl who is racked by fear lest her father's weakness for drink may manifest itself in her and destroy the happiness of the man she loves.

Sharing interest with Miss Frederick is Milton Sills, now a full-fledged favorite. Excellent scope is given him as Robert Craig, the lawyer whose calm reason and understanding seek to convince his fear-driven fiance that nothing that might happen could change his faith in her.

Emmett King, a former Harkins leading man here, as Miss Frederick's father makes his first appearance in Goldwyn pictures. His sound training extending over a period of many years in support of the foremost stage stars guarantees an interesting and satisfying performance in "The Fear Woman."

In Harry S. Northrup, Miss Frederick finds a veteran aide whose experience on the screen is fully as extensive as any player before the public. He plays an ungrateful role.

As a fitting foil to Miss Frederick's dark beauty Beverly Travers plays the part of her indiscreet friend, her fairness of face and hair throwing into sharp relief the star's brunette loveliness. Miss Travers is a comparative newcomer to the screen, but her acting in "The Fear Woman" gives her the sort of opportunity that promises quick recognition.

Walter Hiers, not often found in a strictly dramatic production, plays a role entirely in keeping with his droll personality. His many scenes with Miss Frederick are replete with those moments which he knows so well how to handle. Lydia Yeamans Titus, identified with the stage for years, contributes an amusing character study, and Ernest Pasque also assumes an important role.

APPRENTICESHIP FOR MOTHERS.

In the domain of home economics, which has become so firmly entrenched in the education of American women, the practise house has afforded something comparable to what the hospital offers to the medical student, says the Journal of the American Medical Association. Recently the varied activities in the practise houses of one large educational institution, the University of Minnesota, have been diversified still further by affording opportunities to observe as well as to assist in the care of infants. The latter are secured from orphanages. This form of apprenticeship in the study of the homemaker's job is an innovation which deserves to be watched with interest.
