Just Impediment

By Richard Pryce,

AUTHOR OF "AN EVIL SPIRIT," "THE UGLY STORY OF MISS WETHERBY," ETC.

"Too much nose—like her mother—like all of 'em—her family, I mean. They all run to rose. Always tell 'em so. There's no humbug about me. Oh, yes, I know Agnes is a pretty girl, and, what's more, she's a dear good girl, if her mother wouldn't cram her down one's throat. Imprudent? Of course I am. Always was."

Then came Lord Hurlingham's stentorian laugh that always made Lady Hurlingham shudder. It was the laugh that he gave after one of what she called his shocking stories.

"When your father gives that horrid laugh," she used to say to Agnes, "I always know that he has said something dreadful." And if Agnes happened to be siding with her mother she would allow that her father had atrocious manners.

So Lady Hurlingham looked up the table in some trepidation. She was a ponderous woman with a ponderous manner. She was in the middle of unfolding to her neighbor a great scheme for providing classical concerts for the poor of Whitechapel. "It would be so beneficial, and in a few years I feel confident there would be an appreciable decrease in the terrible crimes that—that——"

Here came her husband's laugh, and forgetting where she was in her sentence, and groping vaguely after sense, she remembered only that she was talking of classical music, and she felt back upon one of her inevitable formulæ, here hopelessly inappropiate—"that do so much to—to elevate the taste of the masses."

"Crimes?" asked the victim she was boring.

"Crimes?" echoed Lady Hurlingham. "Ah, to be sure. Yes, they would disappear."

"I can fancy," said the victim, "the moral effect of a course of Handel, Mozart, and Beethoven upon a pack of factory girls."

"I yet hope to see their tone raised," said Lady Hurlingham.

Lady Heron meanwhile was congratulating herself that as far as she could at present tell—for she was always guarded—her cousin's friends were all that she could wish.

In one of the brief intervals that Lord Hurlingham allowed her, when eating engrossed his full attention, Lady Heron found herself studying Mrs. Wilton. Her age was, at a guess, four or five-and-forty. The face was very pale, and there were lines that suggested suffering. She had a way of looking at her daughter that did not escape her hostess—just the look that a nurse gives in the direction of a charge that is within sight, but not directly at hand. She appeared to talk easily, but always it seemed to Lady Heron that there was a certain preoccupation—gracefully and politely concealed, it is true, but still preoccupation. The subject under discussion never seemed to have her undivided thought. Later, when she herself was talking to Mrs. Wilton in the drawing-room, Lady Heron remarked the same thing.

Meanwhile Rutherford tried to collect his thoughts. For almost the first time in his life the presence of a woman disconcerted him. His thirty years should have taught him that it is always the unexpected that arrives, but they seemed quite to lack the power to steady his head when he found himself sitting next to the girl whose face had fixed itself upon his mind that night in Piccadilly circus. That this face he had seen he knew. He wondered how he could lead up to the matter, and have confirmation from Miss Wilton's lips. While he talked the ordinary trivialities of the hour his brain seemed to throb with the word "Explain! Explain!" He scarcely knew what he was saying during the first few minutes of dinner. Miss Wilton's beauty might well stir his pulses, but he was even himself surprise to note its effect upon him. He had not known till now how deeply the face he had seen had impressed him.

Miss Wilton for her part talked without effort. Her manner was girlish and natural. She affected nothing; perhaps she knew that her charm needed no aid.

She was thinking that Lord Rutherford was manly and good-looking, but a little difficult and inert.

He would not have been flattered at this unspoken comment, but he would at least have been glad to know how little Miss Wilton saw of his bewilderment. His face did not betray him.

Later, he could not have told the exact moment when his natural composure reasserted itself. By degrees he found that he was recovering his balance, and then he gave himself up to the full pleasure of Miss Wilton's society. As he thawed—Miss Wilton accounted thus for the change in his manner—so did she on her part show a corresponding friendliness. Two or three times during dinner she laughed very merrily, and he saw her beautiful teeth.

The hum of of talk grew a little louder with the courses. Lord Hurlingham was telling Lady Heron of the thrashing he had had as a boy for saying what he thought. His wife had exhausted the subject of classical music for the poor of Whitechapel, and was unfolding to her victim the great dangers of "this wave of socialism that is sweeping over us." "I have great faith in pamphlets," she said; "there should be pamphlets written to counteract the harm. Alas! the other side has it all its own way."

"One side must always have it all its own way," said the victim. He had not had an opportunity of saying ten words to the girl between whom and Lady Hurlingham he was sitting.

Mrs. Wilton continued to cast her rapid glances at intervals in the direction of her daughter. The light from the many shaded candles fell on the gleaming cloth; it flashed in the plate and glass, and sparkled in the wines. The servants moved with silent tread. Behind them was the oaken background of carved panels, and above the panels portraits looked down from red walls.

"This is your first visit to London?" said Rutherford.

"My first," said Miss Wilton.

"And your impression?"

"I can't tell you. I had read a great deal about London in books and papers. It far surpasses what I expected in every way, size, beauty—horror."

"Horror?"

A recollection of the fighting women near the Criterion came vividly before him. Was she going herself to lead up to that which had puzzled him?

"Yes, London is terrible as well as beautiful," she said, "and as yet I have not seen a thousandth part of it."

"For your own sake," he said in a low voice, and speaking perhaps as much to himself as to her "do not try to see too much."

"I want to see everything," said Miss Wilton with conviction. "So far I am enthralled by the mystery of it all. Oh, I know that to you London has no mystery; that is only for those who see it for the first time. I cannot explain what I mean by mystery—I know myself—the thousands upon thousands of faces, and every face has a history, and is working out the story of a life—the hurry, the struggles of the many to live, and the little worth of the life they fight for——"

She did not finish her sentence, if indeed it had and end. To her it seemed boundless, and she might have strung on her impressions and their suggestions to infinity.

"Let it keep its mystery," said Rutherford slowly. "I know what you mean. When the mystery is gone half the fascination is lost."

"Fascination, that is the word. I am fascinated. I could spend my life looking on at London as one looks on at a play. I find myself watching the people and wondering. It is like watching an ant-hill."

"It is a dangerous amusement," said Rutherford. "Will you let me warn you?"

"Yes," said Miss Wilton, "of course."

"Then leave the work of Haroun Alraschid to Haroun Alraschild. Avoid the painful side of life. You will make yourself very unhappy. Every city is full of what is distressing and hideous."

"I am not sure that I understand," said Miss Wilton.

He was thinking of the horrible crowd near the Criterion, of what she must have seen and heard, and wondering with amazement how she came to be there. The mention of the Caliph was a shaft from a bow drawn at a venture. It might be that she had some impossible thoughts of seeing things as they were, that she might know what could be done to alleviate suffering. Many smart young women of his acquaintance imagined that they had missions in life.

"You will have no peace if you find how ugly existence can be," he said.

"Ought one to have peace when there is no peace?"

"What have you to do with these matters?" he asked. He realized that he had spoken almost sharply. "I beg your pardon, Miss Wilton," he hastened to add; "I only wish you to save yourself the distress of seeing too much. Already, you say, you have seen a side of London which is terrible——" He looked at her now intently. There was nothing in her answering gaze to tell him whether her thoughts flew to the same scene as his. She waited for him to continue.

But at this moment Lady Heron managed to catch Lady Hurlingham's faded eye, and then followed a moving of chairs and a rustle of dresses, and the ladies left the room.

Choosing a Doctor.

"Many families choose a doctor to attend them in times of sickness. Such families should be extremely careful in their selection. They should shun the man who has a cure for every ill, and who is continually boasting of his wonderful cures, and will never own a failure. Shun such a man; his stock-in-trade is bluff and brag. Medicine is not a positive science, and where there are so many elements of uncertainty, it is not in a physician to know the end from the beginning. When families choose a physician they should be careful to select a man of pure mind and clean lips, temperate in all things, one that can be trusted implicitly, who does not talk too much about his patients, and who can keep his own counsel. Give such a man to understand that you depend upon him, and that he is in a certain sense responsible for the well-being of your family."

The above lines will certainly interest every family in Canada, as they are selected from an article ably written by Dr. J. M. French, a prominent American physician.

Let us add a few remarks for the benefit of our Canadian people—for those families who are about selecting a family physician.

If you find a physician who gives more attention to "professional etiquette" than to the art of healing, pass him by at once. When you find a physician who has no confidence in any prescription or medicines but his own, shun him, he is not truly honest. When the formulæ of master minds are treated with contempt and indifference, and his own ideas are held forth as being the only ones worthy of attention, then, we say, beware of such a character.

If you have become convinced, from experience of your own and of others, that Paine's Celery Compound is the all-important remedy when headaches, nervousness and sleeplessness come upon you, withdraw at once your confidence from any doctor who dare tell you that it is a nostrum; be assured he is jealous and afraid of losing his fees for visits.

The true, honest and noble-minded doctor will say "you are wise, continue its use for any complaint it has promised to cure." The truly honest physician knows well that Paine's Celery Compound is a prescription for all nervous ailments, indigestion and dyspepsia, given by one of the ablest doctors that ever lived, and all honest physicians are prescribing it daily with great success.

If your doctor is a believer in, and an advocate of, Paine's Celery Compound, he is indeed a fearless and true physician.
