A Courageous ..Girl..

The man sat down again before he replied and turned his face slightly away from her gaze as he said:

"It really belonged to your mother dear, instead of to me," for it has always been given to the eldest daughter on the mother's side; so, after your mother died I treasured it to give it to you when you should be old enough to appreciate it."

"I wish you could tell me more about my mother, Uncle Walter," the young girl said wistfully after a moment of silence. "You have never seemed willing to talk about her—you have always evaded and put me off when I asked you anything until I have grown to feel as if there were some mystery connected with her. But surely I am old enough now and have a right to know her history. Was she your only sister and how did it happen that she died all alone in London? Where was my father? and why was she left so poor when you had so much? Really, Uncle Walter, I think I ought to insist upon being told all there is to know about my parents and myself. You have often said you would tell me some time; why not now?"

"Yes, yes, child, you are old enough, if that were all," the man returned with livid lips, a shudder shaking his strong frame from head to foot.

Irene also grew very pale as she observed him, and a look of apprehension swept over her face at his ominous words.

"Was there anything wrong about mamma?" she began tremulously.

"No, no!" Mr. Dinsmore interposed, almost passionately, "she was the purest and the loveliest woman in the world."

"And my father?" breathed the girl, trembling visibly.

"Was a worthless faithless brute!" was the low, stern reply.

"What became of him?"

"Do not ask me, child," the elderlyman returned almost fiercely, but white to his lips, "he deserves only your hatred and contempt, as he has mine. Your mother, as you have been told, died in London, a broken-hearted woman, where she lived for nearly three months in almost destitute circumstances. The moment I learned of her sad condition I hastened to London to give her my care and protection; but she was gone—she had three days before my arrival, and I found only a wee little baby awaiting my care and love."

A sobbing sob burst from the man's lips at this point, but after struggling for a moment for self-control, he resumed:

"The baby was of course, yourself, and I named you Irene for your mother and Ruth for mine. The names do not go together very well, but I loved them both so well I wanted you to bear them. I gave you in charge of a competent nurse with instructions that everything should be done for your comfort and welfare; then I sought to drown my grief in travel and constant change of scene. When I returned to London you were nearly two years old and a lovely, winning child. I brought you, with your nurse by American, resolving that you should always have the tenderest love and care; and Irene, my darling, I have tried to make your life a happy one."

"And you have succeeded, Uncle Walter. I have never known a sorrow, you have been my kind and devoted friend and I love you—I love you with all my heart," the girl got primed, as she threw her arms about his neck and pressed her quivering lips to his corrugated brow.

Mr. Dinsmore folded her close to his breast and held her there in a silent embrace for a moment.

His inner mind was intent upon forcing the remainder of his story; and, gently disengaging herself, he continued:

"But tell me—there is much more that I want to know. What was the trouble—why did my father—"

She was suddenly cut short in her inquiries by the opening of a door and the entrance of a servant.

"There is a caller for you in the drawing room, Miss Irene," the girl remarked as she retreated to her the silver salver on which there lay a visiting card.

Irene took it and read the name engraved upon it.

"It is Dante Landon," she said, a slight look of annoyance crossing over her face. "and I suppose I must go, but you will tell me the rest some other time, Uncle Walter; I should scorn to conceal aught I have

A WOMAN'S ORDEAL

DREADS DOCTOR'S QUESTIONS

Thousands Write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., and Receive Valuable Advice Absolutely Confidential and Free

There can be no more terrible ordeal to a delicate, sensitive, refined woman than to be obliged to answer certain questions in regard to her private ills, even when those questions are asked by her family physician, and many continue to suffer rather than submit to examinations which so many physicians propose in order to intelligently treat the disease; and this is the reason why so many physicians fail to cure female disease.

This is also the reason why thousands upon thousands of women are corresponding with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. To her they can confide every detail of their illness, and from her great knowledge, obtained from years of experience in treating female ills, Mrs. Pinkham can advise women more wisely than the local physician.

Belle Emerentienne Montreuil, of 114 Latourelle St., Quebec, Que., writes:

Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"I suffered for eight months with what the doctors called prolapsus, which caused great weakness all over my system, with faint fleay spells. I kept growing weaker and weaker. I tried several medicines which they claimed would cure my trouble, but nothing was of the least benefit until I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and this helped me so rapidly that I could hardly believe my good fortune. I would gladly have paid $10.00 for that first bottle, for it started me on the road to health, and five bottles cured me.

"I am most grateful for my splendid, robust health, and shall certainly recommend the Vegetable Compound in glowing terms to all my friends and acquaintances, for it is deserving of all the praise I can give it."

Mountains of proof establish the fact that no medicine in the world equals Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for restoring women's health.

all there is to know about my father and mother."

"Yes—yes; some other time I will tell you more," Mr. Dinsmore said, but with a sigh of relief, as if he were glad of this interruption to the mode of a disagreeable subject.

"I will leave the matter here until I come back," Irene said, as she laid it again in its box in the drawer; then, softly kissing her companion on the lips she went slowly and reluctantly from the room.

The moment the door had closed after her, Walter Dinsmore, the proud millionaire and one of New York's most respected and prominent citizens dropped his head upon the desk in front of him and groaned aloud:

"How can I ever tell her?" he cried. "Oh, Irene, Irene! I have tried to do right by your little girl—I have tried to make her life bright and happy, must I atone it now by revealing the wrong and sorrow of poor's Must I tell her?"

A sob burst from him, and then for some time he lay perfectly still as if absorbed in deep thought.

At length he lifted his head, and, with a Napoleonic look on his fine face drew some papers before him and began to write rapidly.

At the expiration of half an hour he folded what he had written, put it in an envelope, and carefully sealed it; then turning it over, wrote "For Irene," on the back.

This done he took up the mirror which she had just given the young girl, pressed hard upon one of the pearl and gold panels with which the frame was quickly studded, and the bottom dropped down in the tiny drawer, revealing within it a package composed of half a dozen letters and a photograph.

THE STUDY OF BIRDS.

International Ornithological Congress Meeting In London to Bring Bird Knowledge Up to Date.

The International Ornithological congress, which recently met in London for the first time, gathered together nearly 400 representatives from almost every important seat of learning in the world. Five European Governments also sent delegates, says The Westminster Budget. Rarely before have so many devotees of a particular branch of science rallied to one centre. The congress was a record one, both in the number of its members and in the interest it has aroused.

There are two types of bird student to be met with at the meetings, which are being held in the Imperial Institute. There is the ardent scientist—the ornithologist pure and simple—who, despite the profundity of his studies, is really the fountain head of all our popular information. And there is the man who would modestly describe himself as a "bird lover," who probably knows little of Latin classifications, but who watches patiently, observes accurately, remembers, and is full of charming conversation.

There is a third type, not to be found in the congress, and who, perhaps, could not well be defined as a bird student, but who forms the vast majority of those who are interested in birds to-day. He is of all ages and all classes all over the country. He might shy at the term "bird lover," but would be ready to admit that he is interested. His interest is a thing comparatively of yesterday. His existence is significant of that gradual turning of the multitude into the quiet ways of nature to find pleasurable recreation which marks the present day.

The great aim of the congress is to bring the world's knowledge of birds up to date, and the lecturers from many countries have widely different ends in view. Some are concerned with new birds. Mr. William F. Bruce and Dr. E. A. Wilson, for instance, came prepared to give the latest information on Antarctic birds, and Count von Berlepsch on new neotropical birds.

Others, like Mr. Frank M. Chapman, who has lectured on the American flamingo and the brown pelican, have given valuable contributions to what is already known of the life history of certain birds. Mr. Chapman exhibited a lantern slide of a flamingo sitting on its nest, which disposed forever of an old theory that the bird built its nest high, and sat, or stood, straddle-legged on it. The flamingo, it was shown, doubles up its extraordinary length of leg much like a carpenter's rule, and sits something like a swan.

Problems of the distribution and movements of birds have been thrashed out. Padre Ernesto Schmitz of Madeira drew attention to the remarkable fact that Madeira and the Canaries, though they lie so close to Africa, do not derive their birds from that country, but from the north. Dr. P. L. Sclater explained that the northeast trade winds, blowing all the year round, bring Madeira its birds, which are nearly all stragglers from the north. One bird found in Madeira is the snow bunting, which would certainly not be looked for in Africa.

Such fine questions as "The significance of sequence in molts and plumages," "Nestling birds and their bearing upon the question of evolution," and "Erythrism in eggs" have been raised by some members. On the evolution question Mr. W. P. Pycraft has advanced a theory that originally all birds nested in trees, and that the first cause of their nesting on the ground was overcrowding. The fact was mentioned that the oldest fossil bird in existence, the archæopteryx, was a tree dweller.

But although the congress was principally concerned with the scientific aspects of bird study, there was an important section dealing with economic ornithology and bird protection which has a direct popular interest. Economic ornithology appeals to every farmer in the land, although the majority might not understand the term. They do understand, however, the value of the sparrow clubs which are becoming so popular in agricultural districts. Prof. Herman has already reported on his investigation of the food of birds since 1900. To-day the question of the usefulness and the harm of the sparrow from the farmer's point of view is to be discussed, and it is certain that the congress will support the Rev. H. H. Slater's recent statement to members of the Farmers' Club that the sparrow "has attached itself to man, influenced by his unclifness and wastefulness, until it has become about the worst of all his pests." As to the rook, opinion on which is much divided among English farmers, Prof. Herman has brought from Hungary a case containing the contents of the crops of rooks taken at different times in the year, the lesson of which is certainly that the rook is a great devourer of some of the farmer's worst pests.

Bird protection is a subject on which most of the members of the congress are agreed. There must not be different laws in neighboring Countries, but unless there is united international action many of our most useful and beautiful birds will soon become extinct. The outlook is decidedly favorable for such international co-operation, for this congress has been prolific of evidence proving its need.

Promptness.

"Do instantly whatever is to be done," wrote Sir Walter Scott to a friend. "Take the hours of refection or recreation after business and never before it. When a regiment is under march the rear is often crowded into confusion because the front does not move speedily and without interruption. It is the same thing with business. If that which is first in hand is not instantly, steadily and regularly dispatched other things accumulate behind till affairs begin to press all at once, and no human brain can stand the confusion. A habit of the mind it is which I very early to have, one of brilliant and talent, especially when their time is not regularly filled up, but left at their own arrangement. But it is like the air round the sun and owls by dazzling, if it does not destroy, the power of vigorous and necessary exertion."
