Secrets of Health and Happiness

Water With Meals Doesn't Delay But Helps Digestion

By DR. LEONARD KEENE HIRSHBERG, A. B., M. A., M. D. (Johns Hopkins University).

DR. HIRSHBERG

Although it has been known these many years that water drunk with your meals aids the digestion of many foods that might otherwise be difficult to digest, newer researches, according to Prof. P. B. Hawk, amply confirm this knowledge.

To be sure, Jeshurun and others who wax fat, ought not to imbibe of sparkling aqua pura at meals, for it is evident that Falstaff may become waterlogged if meats are mixed with drink.

Not only are your rations more completely digested, but the imbibed water causes these better digested products to be absorbed thoroughly and quickly into the blood and tissues.

Moreover, he who takes several glasses of good water simultaneously with his fodder helps to keep bacteria, harmful foods, the necessary peck of dirt and other poisons more dilute and more easily dislodged by the "peristaltic" or worm-like motion of the stomach and intestines.

Way to Reduce.

Odd to tell and contrary to theory, a glass of good water before dinner or breakfast does not wash away the "powers of digestion." Quite the contrary. It promotes the entrance of pepsin, hydrochloric acid and the other digestive juices from the membranous walls of the stomach into this bread-basket proper.

Obviously, water before meals is like an invitation to the dance. It makes for the pleasures and succes of digestion. The more water you drink before and at the table the better your tissues will appreciate the assistance given. For it is a fact, verifiable at the laboratories, that absence or deficiency of enough fluid in the stomach and intestines causes an immediate and continuous withdrawal of liquids from the blood and tissues themselves, thence to be emptied into the food channels.

In fine, if "there live not three good men unhanged, and one of them is fat and grows old," and he wishes to grow thin, all he need do is to shun and abhor water and other liquids with his meals, and the body itself will open its flood-gates and pour out fluid. This causes a loss of water and fat because adipose tissue is largely water and at the same time an expenditure of energy which helps to reduce weight. Whenever water leaves the living fabric to be sent into the alimentary tube it yields work, and this means combustion and consumption of fat.

Water Vitally Needed.

Pure, cold water is balm of Gilead to a parched mouth and stomach. It also rests the tired muscles of the gastric bag. Of course, water, and especially ice water, is not advisable in unlimited amounts, if the individual is "all in," tired out, sickly and below par generally. Even then, however, a glass of cold water is to be preferred, just as a cold shower is better than water of the same temperature as the body.

Water of 50 to 60 degrees Fahrenheit is a tonic because it is palatable and helpful, because it removes the tax of work from the intestinal walls and aids in the digestion and absorption of food.

Water with meals does NOT dilute and weaken the gastric juices and thus interfere with digestion. The contradictory is what happens. It is a necessary whip and fillip to the wall-paper membrances of the stomach, because it prods them on to pour out a greater quantity of pepsin, acids and other food solvents.

The stomach is to man what the motor of a car is to the automobile. Water is like the air to gasoline—there can be no explosions in the engine and motive power unless there is water present to mix with the membranes of the gastric wall as air and gasoline makes the explosive mixture.

The Adventures of Jimmy Coon

COUSIN BRUIN S POILS HIS COAT.

That brave Cousin Bruin swam across the great lake to escape the burning forest fire; but his eyes were so full of smoke that he could hardly see, so he had to wash his face like a Tabby Cat. Jimmy Coon followed around the edge of the lake, where he waited for Cousin Bruin at the edge of the pond.

Jimmy Coon could run faster than Cousin Bruin could swim, and Teddy Possum was with him. "My big Cousin Bruin," said Jimmy Coon, "is the king of the woods; no fire can catch him!"

But Cousin Bruin did not look like a king at all, for his fur was singed, and in spite of his long swim in the lake water his fur smelt of that dreadful fire. He felt so ashamed that he hid in the woods until new fur could grow. Before his fur was usually soft and shiny, but now it was harsh, rough and all singed.

Teddy Possum said, in a very sly way, "What Cousin Bruin needs is a little Bear's grease to rub on his fur coat. It would make it as good as new. But we can't make a hole in him and dig the grease out, so what can we do?" Teddy Possum whispered this in Jimmy Coon's ear, for he was afraid Cousin Bruin would hear him.

Now, Jimmy Coon is certainly as smart as he can be. One would think that he wore his father's thinking cap all the time, and, what do you think he said? "Well," said Jimmy, "I know just exactly what to do, and I have a fine plan. The first thing to do is to get Cousin Bruin fast asleep—not just a light sleep, but sound asleep—and then I'll tell you what to do."

Cousin Bruin was so worn out with his long run through the woods, and his long swim, that he felt more like taking a nap than doing anything else. So those little animal friends gathered leaves together, with little twigs and pieces of moss, and piled them up for a soft bed. Cousin Bruin had never seen them do such a thing before; but as Jimmy Coon had said that he was a king, and as Chatterbox said that all kings do, anyway, is to sit or lie down and be waited on, Cousin Bruin thought it was a very pleasant custom to be a king. So he told them to be very quick about it, as he was very sleepy.

Soon all was ready, and Cousin Bruin lay down for a nap. Teddy Possum and Jimmy Coon sat, one on each side, and fanned him with big leaves to keep the flies and insects away. In a few minutes a loud snoring was heard. Cousin Bruin was sound asleep.

Tomorrow—Fat for the Bear's Coat.

MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

What Allen Drake Asked of Madge.

Allen Drake conducted us to the waiting taxicab in the next street, put us in it and then entered it himself.

I was surprised at this action and I know Lillian was, for at dinner we heard him comment upon the amount of delayed work which was waiting for him, and we both knew that he was not a man to sacrifice necessary work to an empty unnecessary courtesy such as escorting us home would be.

With characteristic promptness, Lillian put her thought into words.

"You know we'd love to have you come with us," she said cordially, "but we also know how very busy you are, and an escort for us is really a superfluous luxury."

"I am indulging in the luxury," he returned with a flattering emphasis on the pronoun, but I was sure that the words were only a mask, and that he had some vital reason for going back with us to Lillian's apartment.

I was sure of it when at Lillian's door he dismissed the taxicab as we alighted, then walked up the old-fashioned steps with us to Lillian's door.

"The evening is young yet," he said, addressing Lillian directly, "and I am wondering if you would do me a great favor."

"You have only to name it," she answered with the charming courtesy which is so characteristic of her.

Madge Understands.

"I have the bad combination of a lot of work to do and the 'makin's' of one of my nervous headaches coming on," he returned smiling. "I happened to remember the wonderful black coffee you gave me once when we were working on a case together. If it wouldn't inconvenience——"

"Of course," she interrupted with ready hospitality. "Come right up. If Betty has gone to bed I will make it myself."

"I won't come up otherwise," he said hastily, "for I remember that it was you, not Betty, who was responsible for the delicious beverage that has lingered so pleasingly in my memory. I take off my hat to Betty in many things culinary, but she cannot equal your coffee."

"Oh, you're trying to blind my eyes to some purpose of your own," Lillian laughed. "You have evidently fathomed the depths of my vanity. But how did you ever discover my secret belief that I make positively the best coffee in the wide wide world?"

She had spoken the literal truth. Lillian — the most immune from feminine foibles of any woman I know—is as conceited and positive about the merits of her culinary concoctions as a woman with no other horizon than the kitchen walls could possibly be.

I smiled to myself as I reflected that Allen Drake's appeal to this vanity of hers had even blinded her ordinarily keen perceptions to the rather patent fact that he was simply making an excuse of the coffee.

Left Alone.

As I followed her into the living room with Allen Drake walking close behind me, I wondered just what errand was bringing him to us with so flimsy an excuse.

For if I gauged Allen Drake correctly, and I was reasonably sure I did, I was certain that no headache, no matter how raging, would compel him to ask aid of any woman or would permit him to admit the physical weakness to her. The excuse must be only a pretext—cleverly predicted upon his knowledge of Lillian's foibles.

"Now amuse each other, children," Lillian commanded, unpinning her hat and tossing it carelessly upon a couch, "while I get the coffee machine."

When she had left the room, Allen Drake turned to me.

"Please stick around," he said almost boyishly. "I've got to tell Mrs. Underwood something, and I don't know how she'll take it."
