For the Christian Watchman.

Follow Me.

Guilty, forsaken, poor, and vile,
I met the Man of Calvary,
He viewed me with a sweet, sad smile
And gently murmured—"Follow me!"

I saw Him wander through the land
Among the poor of Galilee,
I thought each action a command
That seemed to utter—"Follow me!"

I saw Him pray the whole night long
Communing with the Deity,
And still He beckoned me along,
And still He murmured—"Follow me!"

I saw Him in the Judgment Hall,
His glance, my eyes met lovingly,
Me thought I heard Him sadly call
Amid the tumult—"Follow me!"

'Mid beating, buffeting, and scorn,
'Mid sore distress, and agony,
With accents broken and forlorn
I heard Him murmur—"Follow me!"

With bursting heart, and streaming eyes,
I saw Him hanging on the tree:
There, e'en amid his dying sighs
I heard Him murmur—"Follow me!"

Oh Lamb of God! Oh blessed Lord:
Oh friend who died, and died for me,
With joy I hear Thy glorious word,
With joy I go to follow Thee.

Through suffering, and deep distress,
Through grief, and shame, and agony,
Through all,—Oh may I boldly press
If only I may follow Thee.

CHAPTER VI.

CONTINUED.

When Willie awoke on the following morning he thought over the events of the previous day. They were all like a dream. Was it indeed possible that he had been engaged in a brutal fight with a schoolfellow? Was it possible that he had been that boy who had come home covered with blood and dust, and sore with bruises? What to him was the consciousness of victory, or what the applause of his companions? His cousin Henry had been the first to congratulate him, and had praised without restraint his courage and his endurance, but could this compensate for a wounded conscience? Alas, no. The more he thought of it the more miserable he became. His religious education had been too thorough, and the truths of the peaceful religion of Christ had been too carefuly instilled in his heart for him to violate his conscience with impunity.

At breakfast his cousin Henry alluded to the fight with uncommon enthusiasm.

"I guess," he cried, "that fellow wont meddle with you again in a hurry. How the fellows crowed—didn't they though! And to think of you knocking such a big fellow down again and and again. It was the prettiest fight I ever saw!"

"Henry," said his mother, "you ought to have stopped Willie instead of cheering him on. Do you think it is a good thing for boys to act like wild beasts."

"Oh, that's always the way with you women. You'll never let a fellow stick up for his rights. It's all very well for girls not to fight. If you were a man you'd say that Willie did right. Why mother, boys must fight."

"It's not because I am a woman, Henry," said Aunt Helen with a sad smile,—"it's because I want to see you and Willie true gentlemen and true Christians. How can you expect to be followers of Christ if you give way to every petty temptation?"

"You don't expect fellows to be saints, I hope," muttered Henry.

"I expect them to exercise some restraint, Henry."

"Well, all I can say is, I believe you'd let me be mauled to death before you'd let me raise a hand to defend myself. Why, if Willie hadn't fought with that big bully he would never have had any peace. I guess you wouldn't like to be called a nigger, anybow."

"Willie, will you answer me one question?"

"Certainly, Aunt Helen."

"Are you glad or sorry that you had that fight?"

"Sorry," said Willie, frankly.

Henry looked at him with deep disgust.

"Oh, you need not look at him that way, Henry. You know he is no coward. He is brave enough to confess that he is sorry."

"But, Aunt Helen, what could I do?"

"You could have borne it. He would have grown tired of teasing you if he had seen that you did not care for it."

"But I did care for it, and I could not help it, and he knew it, and that's the worst of it."

"Then you should have done the best you could. Besides, you forget, Willie, that there is One who could have assisted you. He knows what scorn and ridicule are. He could help you. "When he was reviled, he reviled not again, when he was persecuted he threatened not.' Would you really like to be like him?"

"Yes, dear aunt."

"Then is it possible for you to be like him if you are so ready to fight upon provocation? "Vengeance is mine, I will repay," saith the Lord. "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you." "If thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink." Will he who said this look with pleasure upon you if you violate his commands?"

Willie sighed and was silent.

"Do not imagine that I think that you have had nothing to endure. I know how hard it must have been to bear what you have borne so long. But in spite of this you know yourself as well as I do, that you did wrong. Am I right, Willie?"

"Yes, you are, dear aunt. But what can I do now?"

"That Bible which you have will tell you. What does it say? "Agree with thine adversary quickly."

At this Henry started.

"I don't see how—" faltered Willie, who felt a strong repugnance to any communication with his enemy.

"If it is your desire to serve God, and be a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, you will try, dear Willie, to overcome every unworthy feeling. You have sinned, and you repent. That is well, but there is something beyond. You must make some sacrifices. Drive away all hard feelings. Go to that boy and try and make friends."

Henry fairly leaped from his chair.

"You can't be in earnest, mother! You can't be! Why it's ridiculous! The idea! I declare you'd like to make a perfect milk-sop of him."

"Willie is his own master, I do my duty. He knows whether I am right or wrong."

"I'd fight a dozen fellows before I'd be so mean-spirited as that."

"I'm afraid you would, my poor boy," said aunt Helen, while tears started into her eyes.

Willie sat silent and thoughtful. A struggle was going on within him. His aunt knew the bold and frank spirit of the boy, and felt confident that he would do right. Here was a stronger test of true courage than any fight could afford, and she believed that Willie would be found equal to it.

At length he spoke,—

"It's very hard, but I'll try."

"Try! try what?" shouted his cousin.

"To make friends," said the other, calmly.

"Make friends—do you mean to say that you will apoligize?" cried Henry, "I do n't believ it."

It was now school time, and the two lads started off together. After school was over Willie went up to his enemy.

Now the news of the late fight had spread through the school, and had been eagerly discussed by the boys, who felt indescribable glee at Willie's victory. They wondered at seeing him so quiet and mild as he appeared after his triumph, and wondered still more when they saw him seek out his late antagonist.

"He's going to polish him off again," said one.

"Wait till you see him give him that left hander," said another.

"Hurrah for Burmah!" cried a little boy.

Willie touched his enemy lightly on the shoulder. He turned round with a sulky expression.

"We had some trouble yesterday," said Willie. "We've had trouble for a whole year. I would like for us to be friends. Come now. I'm sorry I struck you first yesterday. But you were too hard on me, and I couldn't stand it. You've been wrong, and I've been wrong, but I haven't any ill feeling, and I ask you to forget and forgive. Will you shake hands, and make friends?"

Willie spoke with a clear frank tone, and honest face. The boys around looked on with astonishment, but none thought him mean spirited.

The other boy murmured some inaudible words. The consciousness of defeat had embittered his mind. If he disliked Willie before, he hated him now. But he was cowed and over-awed, and so gave no open expression to his feelings. He looked on the ground, and after some few moments, turned on his heel and walked off.

So ended Willie's attempt at reconciliation. However, he felt that he had done his best, and had at least tried to "agree with his adversary."

His cousin had been a mute spectator of the scene. On their way home, however, he was quite free in his comments.

"You did it well any way, Will, but it was no use. You see mother don't understand. It's all very well for her to talk about not fighting, and making up, but if she was a boy I guess she'd change her tune. The fact is, if a boy don't fight he'll have about as tough a time of it as you can imagine. It just shows, too, what a mean chap that fellow is. To think that he wouldn't shake hands when you had gone so far! Before I'd make up with a fellow like that, I'd see him to Jericho."

On Willie's return his aunt came to greet him with a joyous face.

"First tell me your news and I'll tell you mine' said she.

Upon which Henry gave an eloquent description of the scene at school.

"This is my news, Willie" said his aunt, after a few brief ejaculations of pleasure and surprise at Henry's account, and she held out a letter.

Willie uttered a cry of joy.

The letter—how well he knew it! The thin envelope, all covered with the stamps of foreign post offices, with his name written in a well-known hand. He snatched it up and hurried off to his room.

Translated for the Christian Watchman.

The First Thank-offering.

Little Annette had long been sick, and had been brought very near to death. But the unwearied care of the mother, at last succeeded in retaining the uncertain life of the child.—Annette recovered, and greeted the light and the returning spring, with blissful glee.

On a warm May day, the loving mother carried the little one, for the first time, out amidst the blossoming trees. Innumerable flowers glistened upon the garden beds, and unfolded their glittering stars in the rays of the sun. In the midst of this blooming creation, the mother sat down, and with silent tears of joy, pressed to her breast the exulting child. But the little one turned her eye to the variegated flower-bed and laughed and shouted, "Oh how beautiful! How glorious it is here all around!"

"But do you know, my child," inquired the mother, "who has created this inimitable splendor, and caused you so much joy?"

"Who else but you?" answered the child, with a caress. "Does any one upon earth love me as well as you do, dear, kind mother?"

"No one upon earth," said the mother, "but above earth lives a yet higher love than mine. To him you owe your life and all your joys,—Learn, oh Annette, to adore Him in his great creation!"

The child looked upwards inquiringly; but the light blinded her weak eyes; and she sighed and said: "Oh, mother, I cannot understand what you say."

The mother pressed the little one more closely to her heart, and said—"Grieve not on that account, my child. Bye and bye you will see more clearly. To this unseen Being it is enough that you have unconsciously brought to him your first thank offering—by recognizing the highest love as the Creator of this rich creation, and in childish error embraced your mother, while the idea of God filled your grateful heart."—[From the German of Agnes Franz.

The Sabbath School.

For the Christian Watchman.

The Christian's Battle-Song.

The trumpet summons to the strife,
Arise each true believer
Around us press the hosts of Sin
Led on by the Deceiver.
Arise to fight the fight of faith
For glorious life or endless death,
Then gird the gospel armour on,
And march along the road where our great Captain's gone.

They gather round on every side,
The World, the Flesh, the Devil,
But stronger are the hosts of Good
Than all the powers of Evil.
For Jesus is our Chief and King,
His arm shall great deliverance bring.
Then gird the gospel armour on,
And march along the road where our great Captain's gone.

Our breast-plate—it is righteousness,
Which we by faith inherit,
Our Sword, it is the Word of God.
Our Shield, the Holy Spirit
These arms divine, shall conquer all,
Before them every foe must fall.
Then gird the gospel armour on,
And march along the road where our great Captain's gone. P.

The Carleton Sabbath School festival was an occasion of enjoyment to teachers, scholars and friends. Everything passed off pleasantly, and all appeared to enjoy themselves well; yet there were, in our opinion, two or three little things wanting to make the entertainment complete. The duties and blessings of the Sabbath School are in a measure hidden from public view. Hence it is necessary on suitable occasions to throw open the doors and invite the parents and friends to enter. Every arrangement ought then to be made to make the occasion interesting, and to place the School in its true light before those friends. I do not mean to flatter it in any way, or fix up specially for the occasion, but merely to show what has been done. If the scholars have committed portions of Scripture to memory, more or less; if they have searched out Scripture proofs on various subjects; if any have brought others into the school; if any have been converted; give us a full report of these matters. Then if any of the little ones are disposed to get up a short address, their teacher helping them, give it a place; if two others are disposed to get off a dialogue, give them a fair chance; but above all, on such occasions let us hear their sweet voices singing,

"The full notes prolong,
Their festal celebrating,
We hail the day with cheerful lay,
And full notes prolong.
Both cheerful youth and silvery age,
And childhood pure, the gay, the sage,
Full notes to prolong."

It does more than any other one thing toward making those festivels attractive. I think we do not fully realize the power of music—simple, childlike music—in attracting children to the Sabbath School, or we would give more attention to the subject. Mr. J. R. Bradford, in speaking on this subject, remarked, "In our mission schools music is indispensable. It has there a power that will bring in the little boy and the girl when they are ordered by priest and parent to stay away. They will still come to hear these little hymns, they go home and sing them, and the parents sometimes come to the Sabbath School to learn how they may sing them too." They have the Sabbath School Bell in the Carleton School. That is right, but they did not use it on that occasion; that was a great oversight. We do not make these remarks to censure our friends there, but as suggestions to all Sabbath Schools that may propose getting up anything of the kind. Those little things go a great way in making all happy. J.
