A WOMAN'S HAIR IS HER GLORY. Keep your scalp in a healthy condition. If from any cause the hair papilla becomes diseased or debilitated, it either ceases to produce the hair or each successive hair becomes shorter, finer or more brief in its life until finally atrophy of the hair follicles occurs and the hair is dead, and the thinning proceeds slowly and steadily during the rest of the individual's life. Those who are also affected with dandruff should pay immediate attention to the condition, otherwise the hair will begin to fall our and baldness result. The thinness of hair or baldness occurring in connection with sickness of any kind is only temporary; the bulbs are not destroyed and the hair can be reproduced. Give us a trial. We give scientific and sanitary treatment of the scalp, effecting a healthy scalp, and thus promoting a growth of luxuriant hair. MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The News Alice Holcombe Brought.

I do not know just how I reached the front entrance of the schoolhouse in response to the frantic summons of the young taxi driver.

I am afraid that I descended in most undignified fashion, two or three steps at a time, perhaps even recalled a pastime of my childhood and slid down the banisters, secure in the knowledge that the janitor was engaged in another part of the building, and there was no one else around. There were two thoughts urging me to such mad haste—one the need for physical aid to Alice Holcombe, and the other, the necessity for keeping unobserved, if possible, her arrival in an unconscious condition at the school.

The young driver, a boy whose weak eyesight had kept him from the army, and who therefore had not the experience in emergencies which his fellows of the same age would have possessed, stood looking helplessly at the interior of the taxi as I flew down the steps. I knew that he had been driving but a short time had a sudden illuminative flash of the risk one would take being driven by a man with no more initiative or presence of mind than he, and pushed him aside unceremoniously as I reached the door of the taxicab.

My friend lay in a huddled heap upon the floor of the car, fortunately a roomy one. A quick survey told me that she was not dead, but that she needed instant attention. One hand was clenched around a small vial, and for an instant my heart almost stopped beating. Surely she had not—

Then, as I quickly snatched at the bottle I saw that it contained simply a powerful restorative.

Into the School.

"She sent me in for that at the drug store," the boy was babbling, "just after she got in the taxi. 'George, she says, 'I've got such an awful sick headache, I wish you'd get me something at the drug store.' She wrote the name on a little piece of paper and I took it in. She was all right when I gave it to her, and she told me to come here as quick as I could, and I did, and when I got here—"

"Help me lift her," I interrupted his confidences brusquely.

While he had talked I had been getting her limp body into a position where it could easily be lifted out of the taxicab. But the subconscious attention I had given his words made me realize that Alice must have foreseen her own collapse, must have tried to reach me before it happened. I feared that there must have been some serious happening at the coroner's inquest to cause this death-like swoon.

"Slip your arm under her shoulders—the other here—that's it. Now I will take her feet. The door is open. I left it so when I came down. We will take her straight to the kindergarten-room on this first floor. You know where it is."

"Sure. I started in school in that room. Say, is she pretty bad? I can go for a doctor quick as a wink."

"I don't know. I can tell in a few minutes. And we don't want a doctor unless we have to have one. You know she wouldn't like anybody to know of her coming here in a faint."

"Nobody'll never know it from me," he said with boyish earnestness as we bore Alice Holcombe's slight figure up the steps and down the hall to the kindergarten-room, the welcome thought of which with its small level tables had come to me opportunely.

She Speaks.

"That's right. I'm sure she can trust you," I returned. "Now, put her on this table. Hold her until I can get my arms under her shoulders. There—that's it! Now bring two or three more of the tables here so we can stretch her out on the flat surface."

He obeyed me quickly, deftly, as he did every other direction I gave him in the next few minutes. Evidently he was the type of person always cast for the role of assistant, never as principal. But I could have had no better helper, and it was not long before Alice opened her eyes and was able to swallow the restorative which she had brought with her.

She looked from me to the boy helplessly with the wondering glance of those coming out of a swoon. Then she spoke slowly.

"I—didn't—make—it—after—all. Did—anybody—see—me?"

"Only he and I," I answered promptly, "and we'll try to get you upstairs to the office before the janitor passes through here again. He's already swept this room, and we've only to put back the tables as we found them."

"Benny—will—do—that. Won't—you—Benny?" she asked him, with the attention to details to which a woman in the throes of a strong emotion will sometimes stop to attend.

"I had hoped she would allow her attention to be diverted in this very way, for I did not wish to hear the news she had to tell me until the boy, loyal lad though he appeared to be, was safely out of the way.

"Oh, sure, Miss Holcombe! You know I'd do anything for you."

"I know, Benny." Her slow, sweet smile, her monotonous voice, had something tragic in it, the reason for which I did not get until after she was safely ensconced on the sofa in the office and Benny had gone with instructions to return in half an hour for us. Then she suddenly looked up, her eyes tortured, and broke out explosively:

"They arrested Kenneth this afternoon."

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17.

The astrological forecast for this day is a brilliant one, presaging important change and generally fortunate conditions. A breaking up of long-standing congestions will make way for new projects, and unexpected opportunities will present themselves from unusual sources. There is prospect of either journeys, removal or change—either of which should prove advantageous. There is need for caution in all dealings, and also some unpleasantness may result from too ready a tongue or from rash actions. In the realm of the home and in heart affairs, prosperous and happy conditions may prevail, and it is prophesied that "the young will court and marry."

Those whose birthday it is are indicated a year of prosperity and happiness. Important change or traveling is probable. A child born on this day will be original in ideas, inventive and generally successful. While it will be trustworthy and steady it will not have a commonplace life.
