TURF

Fredericton Gleaner:—A new trotter has joined Trainer Wm. Sharon's stable at the Fredericton Park Association's track. Information as to the new one is being kept in the shade but it is believed by horsemen that this trotter will be an important factor in the events for green trotters before the season is over.

Inslie, of New York, beat MacFarlane, of England. W. Heinrich Schmidt defeated De Bellitt of La Boulie. H. W. Stucklen beat Vagliane of La Boulie.

THE RING

Loses on Foul in Winnipeg

Winnipeg, July 3—An unintentional foul landed by Tony Caponi in the seventh round put an end to a 12-round bout between Caponi of Chicago and Freddy Hicks, of Detroit here tonight. The men were mixing it at the ropes when Caponi landed a low blow and the Detroit scrapper doubled up with pain. As he was unable to continue, the bout had to be called off with Hicks getting the newspaper decision as the result of the foul.

Up to the seventh round the bout was a tame one, and it was a good draw up to the mishap. Previous to the match the boxers were arrested and bound over under a bond of $1,000 to keep the peace.

KENNEL

Noted Dogs Dead

Morris Kinney, owner of the Kenelm Kennels, Butler, N.J., did not enjoy the acquisition of the old English sheepdog Barkis very long after his arrival in the United States. The dog, which had won championship honors in England, arrived in the States in April and was shown as recently as June 1. He died on his way home from the show at Auburndale. Mr. Kinney had collected several bitches and had imported Barkis with a view to mating him with them as much as to winning prizes with him.

Another death to be chronicled is that of a black Pomeranian champion, Fox Hills Dandy, which succumbed in his twelfth year from an attack of acute indigestion. In the heyday of his career Dandy's fame extended beyond Pomeranian circles, as he thrice won the New York Ladies' Kennel Association Champion Challenge Cup. Dandy came of an illustrious family and was identical in breeding to the famous champion Haughty Prince. He was one of the few Pomeranians with the correct texture of coat so hard to obtain and so distinctive of the breed. He was a dog that could be shown at any season of the year. His most noted son was the black champion, Redcroft Darkie, whose career was cut short by an automobile.

CRICKET

Montreal Team Defeated

New York, July 4—At West New Brighton yesterday, the team representing the Montreal Cricket Association, played the first match of their annual tour of New York and Philadelphia, with the New York veterans as their opponents. The veterans won by the score of 191 to 160.

NEW ENGLAND LEAGUE SEES CLOSE FIGHT

The close fight in the New England League still continues to attract widespread attention throughout baseball circles all over the country. While there has been little material difference in the respective standings of the clubs, the closeness of the scores indicates that the battle for the flag is keener than ever.

Lawrence, under the leadership of Manager Pieper, still holds first place by a comfortable margin, although its lead can in no way be construed as a runaway. The present standing of the Lawrence club is due principally to the effectiveness of some of the pitchers as well as great hitting strength which has been displayed on timely occasions. Evidently Manager Pieper intends to stand pat on his present line-up.

While Lawrence has been leading the way, most of the excitement has been caused by the jockeying of the Worcester, Lowell and Portland Clubs for second position. These three teams are comfortably bunched and each day second place has practically a new incumbent. The best showing by far has been the rush of the Worcester Club, which has come from behind and is now well up with the leaders. Manager Burkett has made several changes in the past two weeks and has so fortified the Worcester Club that it can now be counted upon as a serious contender for the pennant.

Lowell has also made rapid strides and the addition of a new box man or two has strengthened it considerably. Lowell still has on its roster the premier league batsman.

The Portland Club, with Hugh Duffy directing its destinies, continues to keep within fighting distance of first place. Duffy is trying to strengthen the club in the pitching staff, one place where it is rather weak. He acquired the services of Corey from the New York State League, and this youngster bids fair to develop rapidly. It is also rumored that he is trying to make a deal with the Boston Red Sox and if successful will in all probability secure the services of Pitcher Foster.

The Lynn club is slowly developing, but Manager Flaherty's team will have to increase its hitting strength or secure some new batsmen before the club will be sure to be up in the race. One thing that is certain is that the Lynn organization is thoroughly disciplined, and through this medium is working very smoothly. Manager Flaherty has created a name for himself in this respect, and with the weak points strengthened the Lynn team will be seriously considered as a contender.

Brockton, Fall River and New Bedford hold the remaining positions. The New Bedford Club has made in the last few weeks a much better showing than previously, and is now in a position to move out of last place.

Already scouts from almost every major league organization has been spending the last week or so traveling over the New England League circuit looking over promising young ball players.

Among those prominently mentioned by the major league scouts are Daley of Lowell, Halstein of Lowell, Hayden, catcher for Portland, and Burns, outfielder on the same club; Porter and Harrington of Lynn and Shears of Brockton.

Jim Pfeffer, a former National Leaguer who has been carried along by the Lynn New England League club since the season opened as a member of the pitching staff, has been released by Manager Flaherty. The showing which Scanlon has made caused Flaherty to drop Pfeffer. Scanlon was with Houlton last year.

HOW I DISCOVERED THE FINGER-PRINT SYSTEM

By Dr. HENRY FAULDS

(London Weekly Despatch)

Dr. Henry Faulds, who discovered that finger-prints offered a practically infallible system of identification, and who has just celebrated his seventieth birthday, tells in the following article in the London Weekly Despatch how he made his discovery.

I have been asked to explain how I hit upon finger-prints as a means of identification and what I think should now be done with them. It is difficult now to place ourselves in the position of our grandfathers as to identifying of persons. The good old mole of the novelist may have been useful in a case or two, and mother's marks are, on the whole, pretty permanent, though the smaller ones, may now be artificially obliterated.

At the time when I first began to observe the patterns of finger-tips the demand for a scientific method of identification was general and insistent. The breakdown of the photographic system—very badly worked I think in most cases by the police—had something to do with the cry of jurists, but I think the great Tichborne case was also an important factor, and it had impressed me strongly before leaving England to open a medical mission hospital in Tokio, Japan, the old Yedio. I had sometimes to examine bodies found near the hospital at the river's mouth, and in most cases the victims of purposive strangulation was never identified. Such bodies were often tattoed, but as no registry of tatoo marks existed no help was got from that means.

Now, suppose Nature, who is pretty fertile in her resources, had been required by science to impress an individual seal on each personality, which would be useful in other directions, not obtrusive, living, and hence to a certain extent variable, and yet permanent through a lifetime—how could this be done?

The skin of the fingers and palm generally has a finely ribbed surface, which serves to tighten the grip of objects and possibly helps the sense of touch. And just at the most convenient point—short of the real tips by about half an inch—those ribbed lines or ridges (rugae) are suddenly gathered up into complex patterns one for each finger, into a space about the size of the Sovereign's head on a postage stamp. These are variable—oh! how variable!—and are also living so that the sweat-pores change in size and shape, and they are permanent—for a third part of a century by actual observation, and almost certainly for a whole life-time. Does this show design, as Paley might have argued? I do not know. Those "designs" however, are quite as useful as if a council of paid inventors had determined them individually for a state department of identification.

I was in the habit of looking for other things than strangled men on the coast of Yedo Bay, and one of the things that interested me greatly was very early pottery, sun-dried and hand-made. That those rough vessels lying amid shell heaps had been shaped by human fingers was clear enough, for not only were the finger patterns visible everywhere, but they evidently formed a "motif" of crude decoration, sometimes running into clumsy festoons. The fingers had mostly been slim and small and were either those of women or children. Investigating the subject a little further, I found that this early type of pottery was chosen often at the present day for the custom of "Cha no you" or ceremonial tea-drinking, and a similar type, ornamented in the same way, was produced in terra cotta of a miniature size for children's tea parties and the like. In those latter I began to observe for the first time that the same finger-tip pattern, having perhaps some marked peculiarity, appeared again and again in this modern toy-ware, so that the worker had left her seal-mark on whatever article came from her hand. I began to examine the finger patterns of medical students and patients attending the hospital.

Mummies Identifiable

I then took to imprinting them as ferns are printed, and on collecting and comparing great numbers of them found the varieties of patterns was immense, and yet there was basis enough of likeness for a common classification. I then tested, so far as possible in a limited period, the stability of the pattern. The Japanese students, myself, and one or two other medical men shaved away the rugae, destroyed them by cautery, sand-paper, acids, and the like, but unless the deeper true skin was injured the surface pattern always came up smiling and unimpaired.

Very curiously, too, the skin and even this delicate element in it are very indestructible. A dead body in water bloats and decomposes and soon the features are quite unrecognizable, but those delicate lineations can be smoothed out so as to reveal the old pattern just as before. I ventured to predict that the finger-furrows of mummies would be found recognizable and years afterwards I was able to verify this prediction in the British Museum. A thousand years or two make little difference in them.

A single finger-tip contains a very intricate pattern, and I dare say one could not in a day's search find two very similar patterns in the vast records of Scotland Yard. But a second finger-tip would contain a quite different pattern, and so on till you have imprinted the whole ten finger-prints, as my system requires, when you have a vast body of varying characteristics by which the identification of two sets of finger-prints are to be tested. In practice, someone under an alias is apprehended in suspicious circumstances. His ten finger-tips are imprinted and sent up to the Finger-Print Office, where his record is found, say under a class similar in linear arrangement. A close inspection at once reveals the suspect to be none other that William Sikes, who has been much wanted. Possibly in addition a blood smear has been left on some weapon or cash-box or a finger-mork has been impressed on candle grease. In such a case it may be shown by enlarged photographs that the intricate linings correspond with those of the prisoner and with those of no other known person, so that his presence at the seat of crime is assured.

By the finger-print method, were a method of civil registration established beforehand, the natural seal-mark of the individual corpse could be secured for subsequent study and careful legal verification. Such a system of registration would be useful in many ways and would apply to the army and navy as well, giving greater security against the eloquent record of "missing." Banks in the United States are now using the system freely in place of or along with signatures, and on some parts of the Continent passports and circular notes are signed and verified in this way. In many parts of Germany tramps are registered and held under control by an extension of the finger-print method. I think the need of the moment is some generous extension of registration to civil life. Why should our worst criminals only get the best aid this science can give? A battered corpse was found a month or two ago at the foot of a steep quarry near Edinburgh. The face was a shapeless pulp, but finger-prints were taken and the body was recognized as that of a poacher who had been at his trade. An honest man would have had a nameless grave.

WHEN TOMMY STRUCK

Tommy had been severely caned for being ungrammatical. Nor was this the first time. In fact, so often was our youthful friend punished for the same offence that the iron of an unrelenting hatred entered his small soul. So that one day, when his form-master requested him to ask another scholar to come forward and speak to the said master, promising Tommy a jolly good hiding if the message were delivered ungrammatically, our hero rose to the occasion. Advancing majestically on the youth in question, he first bowed, struck an attitude, and then began:—"There is a common substantive, of the masculine gender, nominative case, and in a violent temper, who sits perched upon the eminence at the other end of the room, and wishes to articulate a few words to you in the present tense." History relateth not whether Master Tommy received further chastisement or a prize in gild-edged covers.

It's a pretty good fault for a woman's elbow to be sharper than her tongue.

THE TRAFFIC LAWS

To the Editor of The Times:

Sir,—Much has been done in the past to insure the safety of pedestrians. The enforcement of the street traffic bye-law gives sure guarantee that those in charge will give their closest attention to the accomplishment of this end, and have already not only given public notice of the existence of a law governing this phase of civic control, but have instructed their executive officers to compel strict adherence on the part of all. As a result we have read with pleasure the evidence of their efforts to this end in their reports of violations, and will watch with interest future developments.

However this may be, there is a feature that has apparently been overlooked. St. John, it must be known is not isolated from the rest of the world so much so that outside people know nought of its existence on the map. In past years it has been looked upon as the resort of many seeking recreation from other turmoiled cities. Such, may we hope, it is at present, and if so we must look to their comfort as well as our own.

No person visiting a strange town knowing that there exist laws binding the citizens of that town will assume to take advantage of the people in claiming exemption from the obligation of such laws. But they must know not only the law but the circumstance of its execution, otherwise they may inadvertently violate, and without the least justice may be made to suffer much humiliation in being taken to task on such a count. An instance of this possibility was given last evening when an automobile bearing the license card of Maine violated the traffic law in running on the wrong side of Charlotte street just as the crowd was dispersing after the band concert and so imperilled not one but many.

To prevent a further occurrence of this, not only for the sake of the public neck but also for the sake of the feelings of those who visit our city should be be the question for solution, and it would not be quite out of order to suggest that means of enlightening strangers as to the obligations resting on them be forthwith adopted and enforced.

A COMING CITIZEN.

"SALES EXCEED TWO MILLIONS A MONTH"

There must be something fine about a cigar to boost its sales up into the millions. It might not be so wonderful for a short period; but, both Tuckett's "CLUB" and Tuckett's "MARGUERITE" are old favorites. They are sold by tobacconists all over the country and have been for years. Clear Havana "filler"—Flor de Vuelta tobacco—which attains a mildness, sweetness and ripeness known to few other places in Cuba, these cigars have consistently maintained a standard that has given them the preference amongst good smokers everywhere.
