HEALTH OR SICKNESS!

CHOOSE BETWEEN THEM.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

The blood furnishes the material of every bone, muscle, gland and fibre in the human frame. When pure, it secures health to every organ, consequently sickness follows. HOLLOWAY'S PILLS operate directly upon the elements of the stream of life, neutralizing the principle of disease, and thus radically curing the malady, whether located in the nerves, the stomach, the liver, the bowels, the muscles, the skin, the brain, or any other part of the system.

USED THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are equally efficacious in complaints common to the whole human race and in disorders peculiar to certain climates and localities.

ALARMING DISORDERS.

Dyspepsia, and derangement of the liver, the source of infirmity and suffering, and the cause of innumerable deaths, yield to these curatives, in all cases, however aggravated, acting as a mild purgative, alterative and tonic; they relieve the bowels, purify the fluids, and invigorate the system and the constitution at the same time.

GENERAL WEAKNESS—NERVOUS COMPLAINTS.

When all stimulants fail, the renovating and bracing properties of these Pills give firmness to the shaking nerves and enfeebled muscles of the victim of general debility.

DELICATE FEMALES.

All irregularities and ailments incident to the delicate and sensitive organs of the sex are removed or prevented by a few doses of these mild, but infallible alteratives. No mother who regards her own or her children's health should fail to have them within her reach.

SCIENTIFIC ENDORSEMENTS.

The London "Lancet," the London "Medical Review," and the most eminent of the faculty in Great Britain, France and Germany, have eulogized the Pills and their inventor.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma	Female Complaints	Piles
Bowel Complaints		Stone and Gravel
Coughs	Heaches
Colds	Indigestion	Secondary Symptoms
Chest Diseases	Influenza
Costiveness	Inflamation	Venereal Affections
Dyspepsia	Inward Weakness
Diarrhœa		Worms, of all kinds.
Dropsy	Liver Complaints
Debility

Fevers and Ague, Lowness of spirits

Poetry.

LIVE BRAVELY.

The world is half darkened with crones
Whose burdens are weighing them down;
They croak of their stars and ill-usage,
And grope in the ditch for a crown.
Why talk to the wind of thy fortune,
Or clutch at distinction and gold?
If thou canst not reach high on the ladder,
Thou canst steady its base by thy hold.

For the flower, though hid in the corner,
Will as faultlessly finish its bloom,—
Will reach for a sparkle of sunshine,
That the clouds have not dared to consume.
And would'st thou be less than a flower—
With thought, and a brain, and a hand?
Why wait for the dribbles of fortune,
When there's something that these may command?

There is food to be won from the furrow,
And forests that wait to be hewn,
There is marble untouched by the chisel—
Dare that brook on the forehead of June.
Will ye let the plow rust in the furrow,
Unbuilded a home or a hall?
Nor bid the stones waken from silence,
Nor fret, as if fretting were all?

Go, learn of the blossom and ant-hill;
There's something thy labor must give,
Light the beacon that pierces the tempest,
Strike the clog from thy footing, and live.
Live—not trail with thy face in the drossy heap,
In the track of the brainless and proud,
Lift the cerements away from thy manhood,
Thou'rt robbing the dead of a shroud.

There's words and there's pens to be wielded,
There's thoughts that must die if unsaid,
Wouldst thou saunter and pine away rosy,
Or sepulchre dreams that are dead?
No, drag not thy hope to the pyre,
Dreams dead from the ashes will rise,
Look not down upon earth for its shadow—
There is sunlight for thee in the skies.

Miscellany.

A LESSON FOR YOUNG LADIES, AND A VERY GOOD AND A VERY FUNNY STORY.

"I vow!" said Joe Chickweed, as he stood before the parlor mirror, putting the last touch to his well-oiled hair, "if I let this night pass without finding out just how I stand with Melinda Martin, then I am a cow. The critter's always acted so pecky skittish, that there's been no getting around her. I like her, and she knows it, and I am inclined to think she likes me; but she likes to have more than one string to her bow, and I ain't sure but she'd ship me any minute if she could make a better bargain. Maybe I'm doing her an injustice, and I hope I am; but she acts something 'ternally like a real coquette, and I don't know what to make of her. Sho—darnedest," he added, fitting an immensely high and an immensely wide brimmed hat upon his shining head, "to-night I'll settle the matter—I'll cross the Rubicon, if I get my boots full of water. Melinda ain't a bad spec, and I might do worse most any where else."

"Do tell if it's come to that!" exclaimed old Mrs. Chickweed, who had entered the room unnoticed by her son, in time to hear his last sentence—"well I've all along had a notion that you was sittin' in that ere direction."

Joe turned red from his eye-winkers to his ankles, and looked very sheepish. He worked very busily, too, for a few seconds, with brushing an imaginary quantity of dust from a place between the shoulders of his coat, which he could'nt reach but he said nothing.

"There aint' nothin' to be ashamed on, Joe," continued the loquacious old lady, apparently greatly pleased at making the discovery she had, "and you spoke gospel truth when you said you might do worse elsewhere. Melinda's a very nice gal."

"Well," said Joe, gaining some courage from his mother's manner, "I'm glad you think so, for I'm bound to make her my wife, if ——"

"If what?" asked the old lady.

"Well, if everything's sign it."

"You must do your duty, Joe, and Melinda's yours. Remember the farm."

"It is a fine farm, no mistake!" said the young man earnestly.

"No better farm of its size in the whole country than the widder Martin's!" said Mrs. Chickweed in an emphatic tone.

"No, I think not."

"And then see how it's stocked; two yoke of the best steers in all these parts, besides her two horses, sayin' nothing of the rest of the critters. And, of course, they'll all go with Melinda when the widder's dead, and before, too, for you will go right onto the farm as soon as you marry, and take charge of everything."

"It's a good opinion, that's a fact," said Joe; but I put a higher value on Melinda than on all the property."

"And well you should; though the farm and fixin's ain't to be despised."

"Oh, I ain't one to despise 'em!"

Joe laughed and left the room, and soon after he left the house, and made his way as expeditiously as the gloom of the evening would permit, towards the residence of the widow Martin. A light was burning in the front room, but the window curtains were closely drawn, so that he could not get a view into the apartment as he passed along the yard. He knocked at the door, and was admitted by the widow in person, who, after inquiring benevolently after his health, ushered him into the parlor.

It was already occupied by two persons—Melinda and Reuben Sparks, the latter a young man who had recently returned to Springville, from California, and who was looked upon with special disfavor by the young farmer.

Joe was welcomed by the young lady, but not so cordially as formerly, and by no means so cordially as Joe thought his due. He was greeted by Mr. Sparks in a sort of a joking, condescending way, that raised his ire inwardly. However, the conversation that followed was apparently agreeable to all parties, and the evening wore away till the widow retired, when Mr. Sparks intimated that it was perhaps time for him to be retiring, as it was quite a little walk to the village. Melinda at once asserted that it was very early indeed, and he should not think of leaving so soon; whereupon Mr. Sparks was induced to remain a while longer, and Mr. Chickweed was secretly enraged that Melinda should be so much taken up with the young sprig.

California became the topic of conversation, and Reuben Sparks shone brilliantly in his descriptive accounts of the country, and what he had done there.

"Then you were'nt in the diggins?" inquired Joe, in response to something his rival had uttered.

"By no means," replied Sparks loftily. "I left digging to those that were used to it; I had'nt no taste that way."

"Oh, then you stopped in town?"

"Certainly."

"Business I spose first rate there."

"Yes; a young man of talent will soon engage himself in profitable employment."

"Then I 'spect you must have done extraordinary well!" said Joe in a tone he intended should be sarcastic.

"Oh!" replied the other, laughing in a meaning way, and winking with one eye at the young lady, who appeared to "take" and enjoy it accordingly—"as for that matter I can't complain. I think I improved my chances,—I rather think I did. No, I don't complain, by no means."

"Then why did'nt you stay longer. You were not gone but a short time; you should have stayed a year or two more, and made yourself independent."

"Perhaps I am independent already; I say perhaps. Of course I cannot tell you the exact amount I made—that, I think, is quite unnecessary."

"Oh, quite."

"And perhaps, too, there were attractions in this part of the world as alluring as gold."

He looked knowingly at Melinda as he spoke, and gave her another wink, which that young lady seemed to relish, though she blushed and appeared wonderfully embarrassed for a moment. Joe noticed what occurred, and felt at all fancy the course affairs seemed to be setting. He knew that he should feel and appear peculiarly savage if he remained much longer, and he hinted that it was about time for him to be going; and what served to enrage him more than aught else, Melinda appeared to be of the same mind, for she offered no objection. So he took his hat and departed, with firmness in his step and bitterness in his heart.

"I don't like the look of this at all," he muttered to himself as he walked on through the dark. "She's altogether too tender to that chap to be agreeable to me. If he has not turned her head then there's a mistake somewhere. I don't believe he has brought enough money from California to buy a rope to hang him. He's after the widder's farm, now, to make it up, I'll bet my [illegible] Melinda, and I've been fool enough to wait till this time before coming to a final point. But perhaps it ain't too late yet!" He added after a few moments' reflection; "maybe she'll consent to have me yet, if I lose no time in asking her. I'll try it, I vow that I will. I'll go over again to-morrow, and have the thing settled."

And having come to this conclusion, he hurried forward, and soon after was dreaming of Melinda Martin, the widow, himself, and quite an infinite number of Reuben Sparkses, who were all endeavouring to chase him up a steep hill, and beat his brains out with bars of California gold.

Mrs. Chickweed was most anxious next morning to learn from her son the result of his mission to the widow's, but Joe was silent and pensive, avoiding his mother's eye, and keeping away from the house as much as possible. Late in the evening he carefully dressed himself in his best suit, and with a look of determination stamped upon his features, he once more set out to visit the fair Melinda.

He found her at home, and alone.

"Hope you spent an agreeable evening yesterday," remarked Joe, after he had passed the usual compliments, and seated himself near the lady.

"Oh yes, I did, I assure you," was the reply.

"Mr. Sparks, I should say, is a very entertaining young man."

Joe didn't think any thing of the kind, but quite the contrary.

"He is, indeed," responded Melinda.

Joe looked any thing but pleased at this encomium on his rival, and sat for some moments in utter silence. At length he turned to the young lady and spoke:

"I came here last evening," he said, "with the intention of speaking to you on a particular subject, but I found you so engaged that I determined to call again to-night, and so—so—"

"Here you are," said Melinda, smiling at his embarrassment.

"Yes, here I am, and now that I'm here, I'll tell you at once what I have come for. You know I love you; I've told you as much more'n once, and I've flattered myself that I were'nt indifferent to you. But now I wish you to tell me if you really love me in return, and if I may hope to make you my wife. Will you marry me?"

Joe having arrived at this important question, looked tenderly and appealingly into her face, and breathlessly waited her reply; she colored slightly and bent her eyes to the ground

"You are quite right," she said, "in supposing that you are not indifferent to me, for I regard you very highly."

"Then all my fears have been groundless!"—uttered Joe, exultingly.

"Then," continued the lady, "I cannot very well grant your wish regarding—"

"What?" cried Joe, his countenance suddenly changing.

"I cannot very well marry you!"

"And why can't you; I'd like to know what's to hinder your marrying me if you think enough of me."

"There is one reason in particular."

"What is it?"

"I'm engaged to another!"

Joe turned pale.

"Sparks!" he cried—"tell me is it Sparks?"

"Well, and if it is?"

"I know it. Blast him, I knew what he was after!"

"I don't know that Mr. Sparks has acted in any way that he should not," remarked the young lady warmly.

"He is a cheatin' villain," replied Joe indignantly.

"You don't know him; he's nothing of the kind!"

"It's you that don't know him; but you will before long. I've been deceived, and I ain't afraid to say so!" continued he, snatching up his hat; "it's the money he pretends to have that's lost me a wife; but when you want to touch it, just as like as not you won't be able."

He rushed from the house as he uttered these words, and hurried homeward. He found his mother still up, and was eagerly interrogated by her as to the luck he had met with. He told her all, and little condolence was she enabled to offer him in return.

For two or three days following, Joe Chickweed said very little, but he thought much. One fine morning he met his mother with a smiling face, and a sort of triumph in his look. The old lady was somewhat surprised at this sudden change in her son's manner.

"Why, what on earth's the matter now, Joe? hope you ain't going to be crazy," said she.

"Not by a long shot—I ain't quite so big a fool as that," replied Joe.

"Then what ails you?"

"Oh, I've got it all arranged at last—I've got him now."

"Who? What?"

"Why, Melinda and that vagabond Reuben Sparks: ha! ha! I'll surprise him."

"Well, how are you going to do it."

"Oh, it's all right. I'll do it, darn'd if I don't. I'll fix the sneaking critter," said Joe, laughing slyly.

"But how—how, Joe? Can't you speak out? What's got into the boy?" cried the old lady, dying with curiosity to know what was his plan.

"Well, now, I'll tell you all about it," began Joe, assuming a more sober tone.

"Well, I just wish you would."

"You know the widder has always favored my keeping company with Melinda."
