POETRY.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH.

From Hood's Comic Annual.

"Good Heaven! Why, even the little children in France speak French!" ADDISON.

Never go to France,
Unless you know the lingo,
If you do, like me
You will repent, by jingo.
Staring like a fool,
And silent as a mummy,
There I stood alone,
A nation with a dummy!

Chaises stood for chairs:
They christen letters Billes,
They call their mothers mares,
And all their daughters filles.
Strange it was to hear,
I'll tell you what's a good pun,
They call their leather quirs,
And hali their shoes are wooden.

Signs I had to make
For every little notion,
Heads all going like
A telegraph in motion.
For wine I reeled about,
To show my meaning rally,
And made a pair of horns
To ask for 'Beef and bally.'

Moo! I cried for milk;
I got my sweet things snugger—
When I kissed Jeannette,
'Twas understood for sugar;
If I wanted bread,
My jaws I set a-going,
And asked for new laid eggs
By clapping hands and crowing!

If I wished a ride,
I'll tell you how I got it—
On my stick astride,
I made believe to trot it.
Then their cash was strange,
It bored me every minute,
Now here's a hog to change,
How many sous are in it?

Never go to France,
Unless you know the lingo,
If you do, like me
You will repent, by jingo.
Staring like a fool,
And silent as a mummy,
There I stood alone,
A nation with a dummy!

VARIETIES.

CHARACTER OF A BRITISH SOLDIER.—As General Foy has been at some pains to misrepresent the character of the British Soldiers, I will set down what many years' experience gives me the right to say is nearer the truth than his dreams. That the British Infantry soldier is more robust than the soldier of any other nation, can scarcely be doubted by those who, in 1815, observed his robust frame, distinguished amidst the United armies of Europe, and, notwithstanding his habitual excess in drinking, he sustains fatigue, and wet, and the extremes of cold and heat with incredible vigour. When completely disciplined, and three years are required to accomplish this, his port is lofty, and his movements free; the whole world cannot produce a nobler specimen of military bearing; nor is the mind unworthy of the outward man. He does not, indeed, possess that presumptuous vivacity which would lead him to dictate to his commanders, or even to censure real errors, although he may perceive them; but he is observant and quick to comprehend his orders, full of resources under difficulties, calm and resolute in danger, and more than usually obedient and careful of his officers in moments of eminent peril. It has been asserted that his undeniable firmness in battle is the result of a phlegmatic constitution, uninspired by moral feeling. Never was a more stupid calumny uttered! Napoleon's troops fought in bright fields, where every helmet caught some beams of glory, but the British Soldier conquered under the cold shade of aristocracy; no honours awaited his daring, no despatch gave his name to the applauses of his countrymen; his life of danger and hardship was unchanged by fame, his death unnoticed. Did his heart sink therefore? Did he not endure with surprising fortitude the sorest of ills, sustain the most terrible assaults in battle unmoved, and, with incredible energy, overthrow every opponent, at all times proving that, while no physical military qualification was wanting, the fount of honour was also full and fresh within him. The result of a hundred battles, and the united testimony of impartial writers of different nations have given the first place, amongst the European infantry, to the British; but, in a comparison between the troops of France and England, it would be unjust not to admit that the cavalry of the latter stands higher in the estimation of the world.—Colonel Napier's History of the War in the Peninsular: Vol. III., just published.

A late number of a foreign periodical gives some accounts of the present intellectual state of Russia, from which we gather the following particulars.—The number of newspapers is 73, the titles of the three principal ones of which are the Northern Bee,—The Patriot, and The Invalid.—They are written in as many as twelve different languages, and enjoy a large circulation. There are upwards of 1400 elementary schools, at which about 70,000 pupils are educated—which shows that one child out of about every 367 receives the rudiments of education. The rest are probably entirely destitute of even superficial cultivation. There are seven universities in Russia, having 300 professors, by whom something upwards of 3,000 youths are instructed. There are four principal theological academies, with thirty-seven upper and eighteen lower seminaries connected with the Greek Church. The Roman Catholic Church has fourteen seminaries, one of which is of a superior order.—N. Y. Evening Post.

OURANG OUTANG.—We were favoured on Saturday with an inspection of two animals of this species, a male and a female, which have recently been imported, and are publicly exhibited at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. One of them was captured in the island of Borneo, the other was taken near the banks of the Gambia. Though they are both of the genus Pongo, yet their formation and difference of colour prove that they belong to two distinct species of that genus. The male is very nearly black, the colour of the female is a dull tawny. We think that in height they were under three feet, but the position in which they place themselves renders it difficult to form an accurate judgment on that point. The female is very thickly clothed with hair upon the body, but the head and face are not deficient in that respect. Her face is exceedingly forbidding; the lower jaw remarkably prominent, nose small, the eyes deeply sunk in the head, and the forehead receding in a most remarkable degree. The expression of her countenance is malicious and discontented. Her arms are long, and wanting in muscularity; the belly is protuberant, and her legs and thighs appear to be very weak. The coldness of this climate seems to affect her considerably, and she fixes herself as nearly as possible to the fire. The head, neck, and arms, and hands of the male bear a more striking resemblance to those of the human form than is observable in the female. He appears to be more lively and contented than his companion. They are both extremely docile, and suffer themselves to be approached without exhibiting the least sign of fear or alarm. They are not confined by any chain or clog, but move about freely on a sort of counter, and receive with evident satisfaction such presents of fruit, &c. as their visiters think proper to bestow on them. We were informed that they feel much attachment to those by whom they are fed; that they have sagacity enough to help themselves, and that when they are about to sleep they shake up their beds and draw a covering over them.

[illegible] R. Vyvyan would be returned [illegible] and Cornwall. Our expectations are [illegible] vain—"the borough king," in spite of all [illegible]ss, his electioneering practice, and his [illegible]y, has been beaten in the north; and [illegible]—not Robert, as the well-informed se[illegible] for the Herald, thinks fit to chris[illegible]

LONDON UNSOCIAL.—There is a great number of individuals, especially in the capital, shut out of all society, but what the well-dressed vagrants, for such they are, afford one another. London is the most unsocial of all earthly places; and hence the number of human flies—I compare them to nothing else than that troublesome, common, and filthy insect—that buzz about its streets and coffee-houses, reeling in cellars by times, and at others thrusting themselves even into clubs. The greatest spreader of the plague is said to be the house-fly; it loves to load itself with corruption, as a bee does with honey, and bear it upon the body of the healthy. So much in support of my simile.
