A DAUGHTER'S HEART.

By MRS. H. LOVETT CAMERON,

Author of "In a Grass Country," "A Lost Wife," "The Cost of a Lie," "This Wicked World," Etc.

SYNOPSIS.

Susan Meyrick, the heroine of the story, returns home from school, and meets Sir Jasper Keith, the antiquated affianced of her sister Adelaide, (age 30 years) and likes him. Keith discovers the selfishness of Adelaide's character and becomes interested in her homely sister, Susan. They go to a fox hunt, Adelaide riding Susan's hunter, Rob Roy, while Susan is put off with an old cart horse. Susan is thrown while getting over a hedge, and when she regains consciousness, Sir Kieth is bending over her. Sir Kieth takes Susan home in a carriage, when Miss Symonds, her chaperone, manifests indignation and surprise, not at Susan's accident, but that she and Sir Kieth should return from the hunt together. Sir Kieth grows tired of Adelaide whose beauty is that of a well groomed animal—does not understand himself, and Susan is full of perplexity. Adelaide is perplexed by Sir Kieth's indifference, but asks no questions. Sir Kieth and Susan discover their feelings toward each other. "What harm have I done you?" Sir Kieth goes away while Adelaide makes preparations for their marriage. Susan is excused from acting as one of the bridesmaids, Lord Kieth sends Susan a copy of Browning's Poems. Susan writes him her thanks. Miss Symonds, who has no love for Susan, detains the letter. Sir Kieth makes a flying visit to the home of the Meyricks. Adelaide being away in London for her trousseau, he interviews Susan, while Miss Symonds plays the eavesdropper. Miss Symonds tears Susan's letter addressed to Lord Keith to Mrs. Meyrick in London. Consternation. Sir Keith is interviewed by by Mrs. Meyrick. He promises never to see Susan again until he is married to Adelaide.

"You do not understand, Mrs. Meyrick. It is necesary, I see, that I should thoroughly explain my position to you. When your daughter Adelaide did me the honor of accepting my offer of marriage, I think you, as well as she, knew perfectly well that mutual respect and regard alone was the basis of feeling between us. I was a soured and disappointed man. I had loved once before, and been deceived, heartlessly and cruelly, and I committed the very foolish mistake of supposing that I was incapable of experiencing again any warmer feeling towards any woman than admiration and esteem. Unfortunately, from the moment I met your daughter Susan I made the discovery that such was not the case. I fell in love with Susan, and I am not in love with Adelaide, Mrs. Meyrick, will you not help me out of this lamentable dilemma? You are a mother; both your children must be dear to you: surely you can feel for them both,—you love them equally: you must see that Adelaide does not love me as Susan loves me—"

Mrs. Meyrick stopped him with an angry gesture: "It is impossible that I can listen to all this, Sir Jasper. You are raving! Is it likely that I will help you to gratify a passing fancy for a mere child, at the expense of a woman whose whole future life has been placed in your hands, or that I will consent to your making Adelaide's name a by word and a jest to the world?"

"But if I love Susan?—if I do not love Adelaide?"

"What has love to do with it?" cried Mrs. Meyrick, stamping her foot impatiently. "You should have thought of that before. You have given your word to Adelaide; your relations to her have been made public to the world. A gentleman and a man of honor does not draw back from such an engagement."

"Do you think that if I were to put it fairly before Adelaide——"

"I forbid you to breathe it to her! I forbid you to trouble her happiness or disturb her peace of mind! Adelaide is the one person on earth who must never have the faintest suspicion of it!"

"But you have no thought for Susan? no pity for her?" he cried, distractedly.

"None whatever. Susan ought to be ashamed of herself. Besides, my dear Jasper, what a mountain out of a molehill! Susan is a mere baby, a silly child who has never spoken to a young man in her life before, and who fancies herself in love with the first who talks to her. Susan will very soon get over this misplaced fancy. It is impossible that you can seriously contemplate such a step as upsetting your engagement to Adelaide for such a trifle."

Keith had risen to his feet. He stood looking gloomily down. He began to perceive that nothing he could do or say would induce Mrs. Meyrick to look at things with his eyes, or to espouse his cause. He had told her plainly enough that he did not love Adelaide; but Mrs. Meyrick evidently did not care a brass farthing whether he loved her or not, so long as he married her. In all probability Adelaide, if consulted would be of the same opinion too. It was a forlorn and quixotic hope to have thrown himself upon Mrs. Meyrick's mercy and to have expected her to lift a finger in his favor.

Mrs. Meyrick adopted a lighter tone. She laid her hand in a friendly fashion upon his shoulder:

"Come, come, my dear Jasper, rouse yourself and be a man! Adelaide is, I know, sincerely attached to you. You will suit each other admirably, I am certain, and you will be very happy together. Promise me that you will not let her guess at this unlucky complication, which I am convinced is only a passing fancy, from which your naturally high sense of honor and right feeling towards both my daughters will certainly rescue you very speedily. Promise me to think no more about it.

"I cannot promise you not to think about it, Mrs. Meyrick," replied Keith, gravely, "because, unluckily, no man can help his thoughts. But, since you have refused to gratify this tangled skein of fate, which your motherly hands could alone have safely unravelled, I must of course submit to your decision, and I will promise you to mention this painful subject no more. As you tell me, and as I know myself, my honor bids me keep my word to Adelaide, and give her my name even if I am unable to give her my heart. That such a marriage can turn out happily, either for her or for myself, is almost an impossibility; but, since you have undertaken the risk of saying that it must take place at all hazards, then take place it shall. You need be under no further apprehension concerning it. Adelaide shall be my wife."

He meant what he said, from the bottom of his heart. He had gone through this painful scene in vain; he had made his appeal to the one person on earth who could have set things right, and his appeal had failed. There was nothing more to be done.

"That is my brave, noble Jasper once more!" cried Mrs. Meyrick, patting his shoulder affectionately and maternally, and wisely refraining from replying to his remark in detail. "You will never be sorry, my dear boy, for having done what is right. I will answer for that. And now you must promise me, too, not to see poor little Susan again until your wedding-day. We must think of her too, mustn't we? and it would not be right or kind—would it?—to upset her any more. Promise me this, dear Jasper, before Adelaide comes in. She will be back to lunch in a very few minutes now, and we must not let her suspect—must we?—that we have been having this agitating little talk together. However, all is well that ends well; and so now the little storm has blown over we shall be as happy as ever again, and dearest Adelaide will be so delighted to see you! The poor child was dreadfully disappointed to lose you last night at the theatre, and again this morning. Ah! here is her hansom, and here she comes."

CHAPTER XI.

If an afternoon tea-party in a London drawing-room is not, to the many unfortunates who are repeatedly condemned to undergo the ordeal of it, a scene of unmitigated joy and gladness, it at any rate presents one undoubted advantage to the observant mind of those who partake in it. If you happen to have anything that wants a great deal of thinking over, it is a capital place in which to think about it.

A hundred and eighty souls—chiefly female souls—are packed closely together in a room in a fashionable Belgravian Square which is calculated to hold one hundred at the utmost, and that not altogether comfortably or with due regard to that measure of cubic feet of atmosphere which we are told is absolutely necessary to the conditions of every human body.

The rooms, half it with big shaded lamps on stands, and half by the faded daylight which still steals feebly in through the unshuttered windows, are very indifferently lighted, and are very hot indeed; and the guests in winter garments, are nearly suffocated with heat, whilst the bonneted and veiled faces can scarcely distinguish one another. Everybody stands cramped up against his or her neighbor, and there is a dead silence in the room. A professional "thought-reader" is finding a pin. If any one were to speak above a whisper, the chances are that he would not find the pin at all. So the hostess has enjoined silence. A privileged circle of ladies in the front room are watching the magic performances with breathless interest; but all the rest of the company by reason of the crowd, can see nothing save the bald top of the thought-reader's blindfolded head as he staggers uncertainly about. The pin, which has been concealed in the innermost recesses of a lady's sealskin muff, is found at last, and triumphant shouts of wonder and applause go round the fortunate few who have witnessed the miracle; after which fresh silence is imposed, and the game begins again.

Mrs. Meyrick, standing jammed up between a great many women in hot furs and velvets in the back room, finds it all very dull and stupid; but, as Adelaide is apparently enjoying the entertainment in the front room, she is compelled to endure it with maternal patience; and at any rate she can think,—and Mrs. Meyrick has got plenty to think about.

Recent events had agitated and upset her. She had been on the brink of a great danger, from which only her own wit and presence of mind had rescued her. Adelaide was saved, indeed, and that was much: it was, indeed, almost everything. But, now that she had leisure to think about other matters, there were sundry disturbing elements still, which worried and perplexed her sorely. She believed that Sir Jasper would give her no further trouble. His marriage with Adelaide was now perhaps a certainty, for it would almost be impossible for him to reopen the subject. Still, until he was actually married there would be danger. And there was Susan. What on earth was to be done about Susan?

If she could only be got rid of in some way before the wedding, what a comfort it would be! But she did not see where she could be sent, or how she could be disposed of. And she was, moreover, sorely perplexed in her own mind as to what steps she should take, if any, under the circumstances that had come to her knowledge concerning her. Should she go down to Raybourne to-morrow and upbraid and punish her? or should she leave it alone and say nothing? She inclined to the latter alternative, Miss Symonds having been sent to the right about, and her mischievous tongue silenced, Mrs. Meyrick felt that on the principle of "least said soonest mended" it might be wiser to feign ignorance concerning Susan's misdemeanors. But what a mercy it it would be if she could only be removed safely and effectually out of Jasper Keith's way!

She was still thinking about it deeply and perplexedly, when a gentle voice at her elbow spoke her name timidly.

She looked round, and beheld a slight, elderly little woman in black, looking at her through a pair of long tortoise-shell-handled eye-glasses.

"It is you, dear Mrs. Meyrick, I am sure," said the lady, doubtfully, "but really this light is so bad and I am so short-sighted, that I have been standing close to you for ten minutes and never saw you! You must forgive me; and dear me! it is such ages since we met. I have not seen you since last season, and I have never thanked you for your kindness to my boy at Christmas."

"It is Mrs. Arkwright, is it not?" said Mrs. Meyrick shaking hands with her. "As you say, it is so dark, one can hardly see anybody. Why don't people light up their rooms better? How is your son? Yes, he was with us at Christmas. My boy is very fond of him. He is a charming young fellow."

"Oh, how kind and good of you, dear Mrs. Meyrick, to say so! I do feel gratified by your opinion, and your dear Cuthbert is such a good friend for him. I do wish I might tell you all about Robert. I have been wanting to see you, for I am in such trouble about him."

"Dear me! I am so sorry to hear it. I am sure, anything I can do——" replied Mrs. Meyrick, politely.

"You see, I have no husband to consult and lean upon, dear Mrs. Meyrick, as you have," began the other woman.

Mrs. Meyrick, under the semi-darkness, smiled grimly. "I certainly have a husband," she replied, with becoming gravity.

"Yes," answered the other, with serene unconsciousness; "and what a blessing that must be to you, my dear! But, you see, I am only a defenceless widow, and a widow has such a terrible responsibility in a grown-up son! If I might only tell you my trouble—?" she said again, timidly.

Mrs. Meyrick began to be interested:

"My dear Mrs. Arkwright, of course tell me. If I can give you any advice, I shall be only too happy. As the mother of a large family, I can enter into so many things. Pray confide to me. I do hope Robert is not giving you anxiety? He seemed such a steady young man."

"So he is, in a way, dear Mrs. Meyrick. But young men will be young men, I suppose, and Robert has money: he is of age you see, now, and he gets his own fortune. Thirty thousand pounds is not enormous, but it is sufficient, and there are such horrid women about! Oh, if I only could see my boy safely married! I live in terror of what may happen. He has left college now, you know, and he lives in town, and there is an actress——" And here the good lady's voice dropped suddenly into an awe-struck whisper. A few sentences were interchanged. Mrs. Meyrick loved gossip; the little story riveted her attention. A very few minutes later the two ladies had slipped into an almost deserted room on the staircase, and were whispering eagerly together.

"You would not be offended, dear Mrs. Meyrick, would you, if I were to tell you all? You will give me leave to speak? Well, then, I will confess to you. My dear Robert is so obstinate, just like his poor father? I begged and prayed him on my knees, on my bended knees, I do assure you, to pause and consider before he wrecked his whole life by marrying this dreadful creature,—ten years older than he is dear Mrs. Meyrick!—and all smothered in paint and hair-dye, for I've seen her: a friend pointed her out to me in the theatre. Well, my poor boy is completely in her clutches: he says he must marry her: the only way out of it, he says, is to marry some one else. And what do you think were his words to me? You would never guess: so I must tell you. 'Mother,' he said, 'I shall have to marry her, though I don't want to. The only girl I've ever seen that I'd like to marry is Miss Meyrick, and I don't suppose her parents would give her to me.'"

"My daughter!" exclaimed Mrs. Meyrick, in astonishment. "Why, doesn't he know that she is going to be married to Sir Jasper Keith almost immediately?"

"Why?"

"I told him I wanted running water in my bedroom, and he put it there, but with nothing to shut it off. Said wasn't specified."

Some people are constantly troubled with boils—no sooner does one heal than another makes its appearance. A thorough course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, the best of blood-purifiers, effectually puts an end to this annoyance. We recommend a trial.

Unnecessarily Scared.

"Is your young man there, Jennie?" her father shouted down stairs in stentorian tones.

"Ye-es, papa," faltered the poor girl, while cold perspiration began to issue from every pore of the lover's body.

"All right. Ask him for the score please; I didn't get it before coming up town."

France and England would not be without it for the world. Canada is fast feeling that way too. The great Lessive Phenix, the marvellous washing solutive. The common powders and the common ashes, which the housewives had to use, have now fallen into the contempt which is their proper portion. Lessive Phenix is a synonym for beauty. Beauty of hands in the wash; beauty of clothes when washed; beauty of the skin when used in the bath. You use it for all kinds of washing; and then you use it for all kinds of cleaning and scouring. A boon to tired, worn woman.

An Embryonic Humorist.

Teacher—Jimmie, what is the chief product of the Malay peninsula?

Jimmie—Malayria.

The record of cures accomplished by Hood's Sarsaparilla can never be completely written. The peculiar curative powers of Hood's Sarsaparilla are successful when everything else has failed. If your blood is impure, your digestion out of order, try Hood's Sarsaparilla.

At the Seaside.

Belle—I noticed that May turned up her nose at your colonel.

Blanche—Yes, one of those seaside girls naturally prefers a naval engagement.

Nature provides a remedy for all ills, and Dr. Williams' Pink Pills is nature's remedy for the ills peculiar to the female system. Suppressions, weakness, nervousness and all diseases resulting from imoverished blood, speedily yield to their treatment. Sold by dealers, or sent on receipt of price—50c. per box, or five boxes for $2—addressing Dr. Williams Med. Co., Brockville, Ont.

An Alarming Prospect.

She—Would you like to hear me sing "Forever and Forever"?

He—Er—well, not quite so long as that.

Go and do likewise. If your whiskers are grizzly and unbecoming use Buckingham's Dye and they will look as you are younger.

Edward's Great Luck.

"Now that we are married, Edward," she murmured, with a neck clasp that spoke volumes. "I must confess I cannot cook."

"In luck again! he shouted, the windows fairly rattling with his enthusiasm.

Few children can be induced to take physic without a struggle, and no wonder—most drugs are extremely nauseating. Ayer's Pills, on the contrary, being sugar-coated, are eagerly swallowed by the little ones, and are, therefore, the favorite family medicine.

Women may be deep thinkers, but they are generally clothes observers.

All who have the care of children should know that Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry may be confidently depended on to cure all summer complaints, diarrhœa dysentery, cramps, colic, cholera infantum, cholera morbus, canker, etc., in children or adults.

Stick to the Right.

Right actions spring from right principles. In cases of diarrhœa, dysentery, cramps, colic, summer complaint, cholera morbus, etc., the right remedy is Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry,—an unfailing cure—made on the principle that nature's remedies are the best. Never travel without it.

Forewarned is Forearmed.

Many of the worst attacks of cholera morbus, cramps, dysentery, colic, etc., come suddenly in the night and speedy and prompt means must be used against them. Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry is the remedy. Keep it at hand for emergencies. It never fails to cure or relieve.

Questioning.

If there is a doubt in your heart to-day
That stretches its shadows across to me,
If you cannot look in my eyes and say,
"My trust is perfect and full and free."
For the sake of a day that would work us woe,
I pray you pity and tell me so.

When you look in my eyes and kiss my face,
And hold me close to your throbbing heart,
Is there ever in it a hint or place
That tells you we could in the future part?
Does a doubt, as faint as an undrawn breath,
Suggest a parting that was not Death?

Dear love, search deep in your heart, I pray,
That its dimmest corner shall come to light;
Then look me straight in the eyes and say
The truth, as the truth seems just and right;
If your love can change—ah, love does, I know—
I pray you pity and tell me so.

NOTICE.
WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.
Traders, Manufacturers and owners of Weights, Measures and Weighing Machines generally are specially requested to read carefully the following instructions and act accordingly:
1. The Weights and Measures Act provides for a regular biennial inspection of all Weights and Measures used for trade purposes, as well as for irregular inspections of the same, which may be made at any time when deemed necessary by the inspector, and it also imposes a heavy penalty on any trader or other person who wilfully obstructs or impedes an inspector or assistant inspector in the performance of his duty under said Act, or who refuses to produce the whole of his weights and measures for inspection when called upon to do so by an inspecting officer.
2. Every trader, manufacturer and owner of weights, measures, and weighing machines when paying money to Inspectors or Assistant Inspectors of Weights and Measures for verification fees, is entitled to, and is specially requested to demand from the officer who makes the inspection, an official certificate ("Form O. 6" with the words "Original for the Trader" printed at the head thereof) properly filled out and stamped, and also at the same time to carefully ascertain whether or not the stamps attached to such certificate represent exactly the value the amount of cash paid. Traders are requested to bear in mind that certificates of verification are of no value whatever unless stamps covering the full amount of fees charged are attached.
3. Owners and holders of these official certificates are specially requested to keep them carefully for two years, and in order to secure a safe keeping it would be advisable to placard them in their places of business in the manner in which ordinary license certificates are done, for it must be distinctly understood that all persons who are unable to produce their properly stamped certificates, when asked to do so by an inspector or assistant inspector, may, in all probability, have to pay over again their verification fees.
