The Woman Who Travels Alone

No woman need dread crossing the ocean alone if she travels by the Royal Line. Both vessels carry a ship's matron, whose sole duty it is to render quiet, unobtrusive aid to women travelling alone or with children.

R.M.S. Royal Edward
R.M.S. Royal George

Many, many letters are on file showing how well this service is appreciated and what a splendid help it has been to women deprived of the usual protection and comfort of family and friends.

But this is only one of the special features of the Royal Line. Read the rest in our descriptive booklets. Ask any agent or write H. C. Bourlier, General Agent, 52 King Street East, Toronto, Ont.

With Edged Tools

By Henry Seton Merriman,
Copyright, 1894, by Harper & Bros

Guy sat and watched the suede gloves with a certain sense of placid enjoyment. Then suddenly he spoke, continuing his remarks where they had been broken off by the advent of the useful old gentleman.

"You see," he said, "it is only natural that a great many people should give me the cold shoulder. My story was a little lame. There is no reason why they should believe in me."

"I believe in you," she answered.

"It was a very unpleasant business," he said in a jerky, self conscious voice. "I didn't know that I was that sort of fellow. The temptation was very great. I nearly gave in and let him do it. He was a stronger man than I. You know—we did not get on well together. He always hoped that I would turn out a literary sort of fellow, and I suppose he was disappointed. I tried at one time, but I found it was no good. From indifference it turned almost to hatred. He disliked me intensely, and I am afraid I did not care for him very much."

Millicent was listening gravely without interrupting—like a man. She had the gift of adapting herself to her environments in a marked degree.

"And," he added curtly, "no one knows how much I wanted that three thousand a year."

The girl moved uneasily and glanced toward the conservatory.

"It was not the money that tempted me," said Guy very deliberately; "it was you."

She rose from her chair as if to join her aunt and the horticultural old gentleman.

"You must not say that," she said in little more than a whisper, and without looking round she went toward Lady Cantourne. Her eyes were gleaming with a singular suppressed excitement, such as one sees in the eyes of a man fresh from a mad run across country.

Guy Oscard rose also and followed more deliberately. There was nothing for him to do but take his leave.

"But," said Lady Cantourne graciously, "if you are determined to go away, you must at least come and say goodbye before you leave."

"Thanks; I should like to do so, if I may."

"We shall be deeply disappointed if you forget," said Millicent, holding out her hand, with a smile full of light heartedness and innocent girlish friendship.

CHAPTER VI.

"CURSE this country! Curse it! Curse it!" The man spoke aloud, but there was no one near to hear. He shook his skinny yellow fist out over the broad river that crept greasily down to the equatorial sea.

All around him the vegetable kingdom had asserted its sovereignty. At his back loomed a dense forest, impenetrable to the foot of man, defying his puny hand armed with ax or saw. The trees were not high, few of them being above twenty feet, but from their branches creepers and parasites hung in tangled profusion, interlaced, joining tree to tree for acres—nay, for miles.

As far as the eye could reach either bank of the slow river was thus covered with rank vegetation—mile after mile without variety, without hope. The glassy surface of the water was broken here and there by certain black forms floating like logs half hidden beneath the wave. These were crocodiles. The river was the Ogowe, and the man who cursed it was Victor Durnovo, employee of the Loango trading association, whose business it was at that season to travel into the interior of Africa to buy, barter or steal ivory for his masters.

He was a small faced man, with a squarely aquiline nose and a black mustache which hung like a valance over his mouth. From the growth of that curtain-like mustache Victor Durnovo's worldly prosperity might have been said to date. No one seeing his mouth had before that time been prevailed upon to trust him. Nature has a way of hanging out signs and then covering them up so that the casual fail to see. He was a man of medium height, with abnormally long arms and a somewhat truculent way of walking, as if his foot was ever ready to kick anything or any person who might come in his way.

Victor Durnovo had sent his boatmen into the forest to find a few dates, a few handfuls of firewood, and while they were absent he gave vent to that wild unreasoning passion which he inhaled into the white man's lungs with the air of equatoral Africa.

"Curse this country!" he shouted. "Curse it, curse it—river and tree, man and beast!"

Presently a peacefulness seemed to come over him, for his eyes lost their glitter and his heavy lids drooped. His arms were crossed behind his head. Before him lay the river.

Suddenly he sat upright, all eagerness and attention. Not a leaf stirred. It was about 5 o'clock in the evening, the stillest hour of the twenty-four. In such a silence the least sound would travel almost any distance, and there was a sound traveling over the water to him. It was nothing but a thud repeated with singular regularity, but to his practiced ears it conveyed much. He knew that a boat was approaching, as yet hidden by some distant curve in the river. The thud was caused by the contact of six paddles with the gunwale of the canoe as the paddlers withdrew them from the water.

Victor Durnovo rose again and brought from the boat a second rifle, which he laid beside the double barreled Reilly which was never more than a yard away from him, waking or sleeping. Then he waited. He knew that no boat could reach the bank without his full permission, for all the rowers could be killed before they got within a hundred yards of his rifle. He was probably the best rifle shot but one in that country, and the other, the very best, happened to be in the approaching canoe.

After the space of ten minutes the boat came in sight—a long, black form on the still waters. It was too far away for him to distinguish anything beyond the fact that it was a native boat.

"Eight hundred yards," muttered Durnovo over the sight of his rifle.

He looked upon this river as his own, and he knew the native of equatorial Africa. Therefore he dropped a bullet into the water, under the bow of the canoe, at 800 yards.

A moment later there was a sound which can only be written "P-tit" between his legs, and he had to wipe a shower of dust from his eyes. A puff of blue smoke rose slowly over the boat and a sharp report broke the silence a second time.

Then Victor Durnovo leaped to his feet and waved his hat in the air. From the canoe there was an answering greeting, and the man on the bank went to the water's edge, still carrying the rifle from which he was never parted.

Durnovo was the first to speak when the boat came within hail.

"Very sorry," he shouted. "Thought you were a native boat. Must establish a funk—get in the first shot, you know."

"All right," replied one of the Europeans in the approaching craft, with a courteous wave of the hand, "no harm done."

There were two white men and six blacks in the long and clumsy boat. One of the Europeans lay in the bow while the other was stretched at his ease in the stern, reclining on the canvas of a neatly folded tent. The last named was evidently the leader of the little expedition, while the manner and attitude of the man in the bow suggested the servitude of a disciplined soldier slightly relaxed by abnormal circumstances.

A puff of blue smoke rose slowly over the boat.

"Who fired that shot?" inquired Durnovo, when there was no longer any necessity to shout.

"Joseph," replied the man in the stern of the boat, indicating his companion. "Was it a near thing?"

"About as near as I care about. It threw up the dust between my legs."

The man called Joseph grinned. Nature had given him liberally of the wherewithal for indulgence in that relaxation, and Durnovo smiled rather constrainedly. Joseph was grabbing at the long reedy grass, bringing the canoe to a standstill, and it was some moments before his extensive mouth submitted to control.

"I presume you are Mr. Durnovo?" said the man in the stern of the boat, rising leisurely from his recumbent position and speaking with a courteous savior faire which seemed slightly out of place in the wilds of central Africa.

He was a tall man with a small aristocratic head and a refined face, which somehow suggested an aristocrat of old France.

"Yes," answered Durnovo.

ATHLETICS VERSUS MILITIA.

CALGARY, Alta., Aug. 29.—Through lawyers for the Athletic Association, who oppose the granting the Lewata Park for a proposed armory, the transfer of property from the city to the federal authorities was blocked on application for summons to quash the aldermanic resolution authorizing the transfer. The proceedings have the effect of an injunction until September 15 when the case will be heard. The controversy is exciting much interest among local militia men on one hand and athletes on the other.

A MESSAGE FOR THOSE WHO SUFFER

Mrs. E. J. Talbot Tells Them to Find a Cure in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

She Had Rheumatism, Lumbago and Neuralgia and Found the Remedy She Was Looking for in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

HAMILTON, Ont., Aug. 25—(Special)—"I know there are a lot of people who suffer and do not know what will cure them. Dodd's Kidney Pills will."

These are the words of Mrs. E. J. Talbot who resides at 29 Wellington Street north this city. And Mrs. Talbot speaks out of her own experience.

"Last July I was very sick," Mrs. Talbot continues. "My heart bothered me, my limbs were heavy, and I had a dragging sensation across the loins. Rheumatism, lumbago and neuralgia added to my sufferings and the doctor I called in did not help me much.

"I finally decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills, I have used seven boxes and I am so much stronger and better that I feel I must recommend them to others."

Mrs. Talbot's complication of troubles all came from sick kidneys. That's why Dodd's Kidney Pills cured them. For Dodd's Kidney Pills are no cure-all. They simply cure kidney disease of any kind. They never fail to do that.

Dollar Wheat Predicted

CHICAGO, Aug. 29.—Dollar wheat, dollar corn and dollar potatoes is the forecast sent to farmers by The Orange Judd Farmer. Other food products are likely to carry prices in proportion.

"The world's production of oats, rye, buckwheat and other small grains is below normal," it is said, "and corn is the smallest in years. The same is true of potatoes in America and Europe. The intrinsic market worth of wheat at Chicago is fully $1 a bushel.

"The shortage in the crop is 600,000,000 bushels. Reduced yield of forage, pastures and hay will increase the demand for corn as feed for live stock. Its use as human food and in manufacture is steadily increasing. With all these things taken into consideration, it can be seen readily that corn should be worth $1 a bushel."

Loose habits generally lead to tight places.

The Bar Wins

It costs money to put soap into cakes and it doesn't improve the soap. See this: One bar of N.P. SOAP at 15 cents weighs more than four 5¢ cakes of soap—more than 5 cakes of some. And ask any woman if N.P. isn't the best soap.
