London, Wednesday, Aug. 27.

DIANA WENTWORTH,

Or, The Professor's Daughter.

Her answer was received in silence, and after waiting for a moment, she went on:

"Why have you sent for me uncle?"

"I want you to be so good as to explain your conduct this morning. Guy tells me that you did not ride with him to Drayton."

"I met a friend whom I had not seen for a long time, and I wished to speak to him; I told Guy to go on without me."

"And who is your friend?"

"Mr. Garthwaite — Mr. John Garthwaite."

"Brother of the farmer whose farm we going to buy to-morrow?"

"Yes, his brother."

"May I ask you where you made his acquaintance, and how you came to call such a man as that your friend?"

His tone was perfectly polite, but there was a note of railery in his voice which Diana did not fail to notice.

"I made his acquaintance at Jacewo, and I call him my friend because he has been exceedingly kind to me."

"An excellent reason under ordinary circumstances, but I cannot imagine how a man in his position could ever have it in his power to be 'kind' to you, in the ordinary acceptance of the word. He might, of course render you services which would for the time being place you in his debt; but such debts are easily discharged between a lady in your position and a man in his. There is no earthly reason for recognizing him here."

"How do you mean?" she asked. "I do not quite understand."

"A douceur proportioned to the services he had rendered would have acquitted your debt and have given him every satisfaction."

Diana had come downstairs in a heroic mood, prepared to defend herself before all and every one, and for an instant her uncle's words sent the hot blood into her face and fire into her heart and eyes. Then all in a minute John's real position, and the intimacy between them, came into her mind, her anger vanished, and she felt inclined to laugh aloud. Her whole face changed, and in the twinkling of an eye she entered into the spirit of the scene. She would reserve her heroics; here they would be out of the place, later they might come in with fitness.

"I see," she said, "you evidently think I went too far; but what would you have had me do, when we had been so intimate at Jacewo?"

"His presence at Jacewo will need explaining later," said her uncle. "I do not understand that part of the story at all; but as far as recognizing him here, considering who he is and the circumstances of his return to this country, which he quitted thirteen years ago under the most suspicious circumstances, it was highly undesirable that you should accord him any recognition at all; but if you thought it really necessary, it would have been enough to bow and pass on."

"Really," said Diana, "I am sorry to differ from you, but he had done so many things for me, I should have felt most ungracious if I had not stopped to speak. You see, he came positively to my rescue on several really critical occasions. You may remember my telling you of an accident I had on my journey, and that I was most awkwardly placed, until a gentleman came to my assistance, and drove me on to Jacewo in his own carriage. That gentleman was Mr. Garthwaite. Then, again, I told you once how I went too far along a lonely road and a disagreeable man tried to rob me of my watch, and would have succeeded had not someone come up and sent him away. That someone was Mr. Garthwaite. The Camphausens, the people I was with, were not fond of nor particularly kind to me, and they would, no doubt, have made themselves very disagreeable, had I not a compatriot in the place, who, they knew, would visit upon them any discomfort they inflicted upon me. That compatriot was Mr. Garthwaite. Any comforts I enjoyed while I was there were due entirely to his presence in the place."

She had begun to speak quite calmly, but she became a little excited as she went on, and when she paused her voice was not quite steady. She stopped, more in order to regain her self-control than because she said all she felt. Her uncle's voice, when he began to speak again, sounded very hard and cold.

"I really fail to see he has done anything other men would not have done. I see no occasion for making him into a hero."

"I did not say no other man would have done it, but the fact remains that it was he who did do these things and not any other man."

The fact did remain and could not be gainsaid; Mr. Meredith therefore left that point.

"What I do not understand is, how a man in his position could have influenced the people with whom you were living. Supposing for the sake of argument, they had positively ill-used you, what could he have done? How would he have known of it? I presume you would scarcely have taken the story of your suffering to a common workingman. The difference in your positions would have forbidden even you to do such a thing as that."

"Yes," said Diana, looking straight into her uncle's face, "the difference in our positions. I don't think you realize how great it was. The people out there were a benighted race; they had never heard the name of Meredith. To them I was only a governess, hired for £16 a year to teach their children, and I must have been very poor and friendless, or else I should not have traveled so far to earn so little. That is what I was. He was the most important man in the place."

She stopped for a moment, then asked, "Did you ever hear of an engineer called Garthwaite?"

"Of course, but——"

"He is that engineer, that Mr. Garthwaite."

There was a dead silence; no one spoke. At last Mr. Meredith said:

"Impossible. It is a mere coincidence of names, of which this man too advantage to win your confidence. No doubt he told you this story."

"He told me nothing, I learned it from other people; it was not a fact that could remain hidden. He was there making a railway, and it was not long before I was told who he was. "That," she went on, "is your common workingman. A man who is known pretty nearly all over the civilized world, was to be repaid for having taken the trouble to help me out of more than one disagreeable position by a douceur which would acquit me and perfectly satisfy him. That is the man whose brother's farm you are going to buy to-morrow. Do not be so sure of it. I am proud to call him my friend."

"Diana be silent," said her mother who was alarmed at the expression on her brother's face. "You are speaking most unbecomingly to your uncle. I forbid you to say another word."

Diana was silent, but whether in obedience to her mother cannot be known for certainty. She turned to her uncle, waiting for him to speak. Mr. Meredith controlled his anger and began:

"Let us hear no more of this. You do not know what you are talking about. Their can be no question of friendship between people in your respective positions. The position to which he has succeeded in raising himself, by what means it will not perhaps be better to inquire, does not in the least alter his birth. He is and will remain one of those Garthwaite's here, who are about as disreputable a lot as you will find anywhere. Not one has but drunk himself to death, and I have no doubt your 'friend' will end in the same way."

He went on speaking but Diana did not hear. Reuben's words had come back to her. "He plays at being a gentleman; but we'd the same father and mother; what do you think o' that, now?" She thought of Reuben Garthwaite as she had seen him then, as she had seen him this morning. What if behind John's qualities and manners, which had such a powerful influence over her, there were lurking something which, under given conditions, could turn him into a creature like his brother? If John had occupied Reuben's position, or were ever by circumstances to be degraded to it, he might sink into Reuben's level. This thought which had never come to her before, struck her now with overwhelming force, and for a moment she shrank before it. Then she shook it off. John was no creature of circumstance, nor would ever be. What he was now was the result of force of character. Under no conditions could he become such as Reuben was; under no conditions could Reuben become as John. She cast the doubt from her with the strength of inward conviction, nor did it ever assail her again. Once more she gave ear to what her uncle was saying; it bore odly upon what had just been in her mind.

"What is bred in the bone will come out in the flesh. However he may have contrived to raise himself, you can't lose sight of the low level from which he has sprung—you can't separate a man from his family. Because he happens to have better manners than his brother, who is a mere brute, you cannot put him on a level with yourself. You must keep him in his proper place; it is a farce to call him your friend; you cannot keep it up. You cannot call upon his mother and sisters, if he has any; you can't ask them here. How are you going to carry on your intimacy?"

He had endeavored to speak moderately, as if he were reasoning on a point which might be maintained; but his dislike and contempt for the Garthwaites was heard in every word—neither was he able to keep his voice free from the sarcastic and sneering tone which represented his real feelings on the subject. He had expected a fiery retort from his niece, but to his surprise, she said nothing at all. He was encouraged to revert to his original manner.

"You should have thought of all these things this morning before you acted on your mad impulse, insulting us and compromising yourself by a show of intimacy—an assumption of equality—with a man so far beneath you in every way that your conduct would have been ridiculous if, considering the peculiar circumstances, it had not been —disgraceful," he concluded, after pausing for a suitable word.

FUN, FACTS AND FICTION.

A good woman's first instinct is to fight against love. She sees a difference between being in love and loving and is afraid that her feelings may lead where her heart might not follow.

Hair Magic.

Is a good name of Dr. Dorenwend's German preparation for the hair. It really works like magic. All who have used it pronounce it to be unequaled for remedying the lost vitality of the hair roots, restoring gray hair, removing dandruff, etc. Just try it. It is first-class. All druggists sell it.

To woman man owes his life and to woman he ought to owe his happiness. Without woman civilization would be impossible and society would fall to pieces.

A man's wife should always be the same, especially to her husband; but if she is weak and nervous and uses Carter's Iron Pills, she cannot be, for they will make her "feel like a different person," at least so they all say, and their husbands say so, too.

"There is an art in putting on gloves," says a fashion paper. Come to think of it, you have to get your hand in before you can master the art.

Carter's Little Liver Pills must not be confounded with common Cathartic or Purgative Pills, as they are entirely unlike them in every respect. One trial will prove their superiority.

Buying and Raising Berries.

A writer in Popular Gardening reports an interesting case of a farmer who thought he could obtain strawberries and currants at less expense than in any attempts to raise them. The past season he continued the practice of buying instead of raising his berries, and being short of cash to pay for them, he brought oats in exchange. The oats were worth 15 cents a bushel at that place, and the strawberries 15 cents a quart, and a bushel of oats was required to pay for a quart of berries. The farmer had to drive ten miles with his oats, returning an equal distance with his berries, the trip consuming most of the day. The strawberry raiser grew 100 bushels on an acre, and the farmer 35 bushels of oats, and it was found better on the whole to sell strawberries to buy oats, than to sell oats to buy strawberries.

Ensilage for Summer Food.

Mr. C. D. Tylee, the progressive farmer and fruit-grower of Ste. Therese, near Montreal, wrote us some time ago mentioning his great success in feeding ensilage to his cows even at this late season. His cows are stall fed and receive cut grass and bran, but enjoy the ensilage twice daily, eating a bushel of it at each meal. We have since seen Mr. Tylee's stock and found the cows particularly healthy and productive. Ensilage can therefore be counted upon as a safeguard against exceptional droughts, etc., in summer, as well as standard food for winter.—[E. A.
