TRANSFORMATION.

By Miss Laura C. Redden ("Howard Glyndon").

"But then you take my friend from me!"
She looked into his eyes:
The sky, awakening womanhood
Grows bolder from surprise.
"Who finds a lover needs must lose
A friend, however tried!"
"Choose you the lover or the friend!"
His deeper voice replied.
The shadow of some coming pain,
Of some mysterious ill,
Hung round her young, uncertain soul,
And made her falter still.
Ah! sweeter far to droop and dream
Above a love untold
And vaguely guessed, than when we count
What we may have and hold.
But this faint, lingering, strange regret
Her woman's heart construed
Into a longing for the ties
Of Friendship's graver mood.
"Ah! let me keep my friend," she cried,
"Whose gently guiding hand
Subdues my grief and plans my joys,
With such serene command!"
"Mine is a man's impulse, and you
Are wise in your way,
And cooler in your blood; but I
No medium course essay.
"Our lives must blind, or we must part,—
The fault lies with you!"
She could not say, "Depart from me!"
For that she could not do.
"But if I give you all," she cried,
"My life, my love, my soul;
The surety of my happiness
Goes into your control!"
An answering look, a clasping arm,
A passionate caress,—
Man's old reply to woman's words,
Not yet believed the less.

NOTES AND NEWS.

UNITED STATES.

Harper's Weekly gives a new formula: Brown—"Were you ever bitten by a dog?" Smith—"Oh, yes; certainly." Brown—"Thought so—so was I—water's very dangerous; develops bow-wow." Smith—"O. K.; we'll avoid danger."

Provided the matters in litigation are amicably settled, it is announced that Fechter's theatre in New York is to be reopened for a brief season early in September, when John T. Raymond will appear in Mark Twain's dramatization of "The Gilded Age."

It is said of Katie King, the Philadelphia ghost, that on one occasion a young man attempted to clasp Katie in his arms. She seemed greatly distressed and slipped from his embrace like a shadow and did not appear again that evening. That's right, Katie, no hugging before marriage.

The Walworth tragedy is developing sadly. It was only last year that New York was startled by the parricidal shot. Yet, in the interval, the mother of the victim has died, and now comes the announcement that the parracide himself has become demented.

GENERAL.

The Iceland National hymn is very sweet. It begins thus: "Eldgamla Isafoldt astkaera fostwrmold!"

George Eliot is a blonde, with light auburn hair, clear smiling eyes, and beautiful teeth. Georgeous!

The wine dealers of France are accused of forming a clique for raising prices. The Widder Clicquot should see about this.

Common kerosene is now said to be a sovereign cure for rheumatism. All you have to do is to touch it off with a match.

The Calcutta public are making merry over their famine. Boxes at the opera have all been bought up at prices ranging from $550 to $700 each. Starvation is usually depressing, but they won't acknowledge the corn.

The returns furnished to the British Government show an enormous decrease during the first six months of this year in the number of emigrants from the Mersey. The calculation in numbers estimates the decrease of 49,357 persons as compared with the corresponding period of last year.

Among the fashionable marriages in London a second appearance at the hymeneal altar of the Marquis of Waterford is noted. His choice this time is Lady Blanche Somerset, only daughter of the Duke of Beaufort. It is said that Sir Michael Hicks Beach is also about to find a helpmeet in his Irish Secretaryship. The lady is a daughter of Earl Fortescue.

Will gentlemen never learn how to manage the moustache? saucily inquires Miss Sparkle. These lip decorators have been long enough in vogue to be understood. But no; after every sip of soup, wine or water, out goes the tongue for the first brush at the moustache, and next follows the napkin sweep. If there is one thing funny in this world it is this constant moustache performance at dinner.

Commenting on the proposed Reciprocity Treaty, with Canada, The Pall Mall Gazette says that "it may fairly be argued that the United States give up too little and demand too much; and the point for England, or rather for Canada, to settle is simply whether the gain by way of free trade is great enough to outweigh the loss in the abandonment of monopolies in fishing rights and canal navigation."

Four members of the German Reichstag are now undergoing imprisonment for political offenses, three others have been sentenced to imprisonment, two have been fined, and proceedings have been instituted against three others. They all belong to the Socialist and Ultramontane parties, only four out of the nine Socialist members of the Reichstag being at the present time exempt from prosecution.

A tricolor flag on the summit of Metz Cathedral, which had been a constant eyesore to the Germans, was recently removed, a reward of $75 having been offered for the feat, which was attended with considerable danger, as, after the top of the Gothic tower was reached, two balls had to be scaled to reach the flagstaff. A man named Demange, a house-painter at Metz, lately made the attempt and brought down the obnoxious emblem of French rule, substituting therefor a German flag of black, white, and red. Previously, seven Germans had tried to accomplish the task, but two lost their lives and the other five failed.

"The Splint," which excited so much interest in Paris last season, is to be brought out at the opening of the season at the Union Square Theatre in New York, with Miss Clara Morris, Charles R. Thorne, Jr., and Stuart Robson in the leading characters. It is to be put upon the stage with superb costumes and properties, and it is intended that it shall exceed in splendor its first production abroad. Miss Morris is now in Paris preparing herself in part for the opening.

Victor Hugo, having been invited to the Petrarch celebrations at Avignon, returned a characteristic reply, in which he said: "I congratulate Avignon, which is giving an illustrious spectacle. It might be said that Rome and Paris have met; Rome which consecrated Petrarch, and Paris which threw down the Bastile; Rome which crowns poets, and Paris which dethrones kings; Rome which glorifies human thought, and Paris which unchains it. The embrace of two mother cities is superb. It is the embrace of two ideas. Nothing is more pathetic, nothing more reassuring—Rome and Paris fraternizing in the holy democratic communion."

Prof. Zeller's biography of Strauss, the Berlin correspondent of The London Notes says, promises to create nearly as great a sensation as "The Old and the New Faith." It is not so much a critical history of the great skeptic, such a one as may and will be written a decade later, as a brief and eloquent tribute of love from one who was a pupil of Strauss without sharing all his opinions, and who, like Strauss, has felt the sharp sting of public intolerance among his countrymen. The book is, therefore, an exquisite monograph. Within the limits of a hundred pages the author manages to present a graphic picture of Strauss the man, Strauss the thinker; and both the man and the thinker as affected by the circumstances of the times.

Ex-Premier Gladstone, in a letter to Miss Lydia Becker acknowledging a memorial signed by 18,000 women in favor of women's suffrage, writes: "I have the honor to acknowledge the memorial signed by names of so much distinction, and by so large an aggregate, with reference to the legal disadvantages and disabilities of women. I do not recede from any statement that I have made in Parliament during former years on this important question, and I am glad that in one or more instances abusive provisions have been removed from the statute book. But I confine myself to this general statement, and reserve any more particular declaration with respect to any proposed mode of procedure for whatever I may deem a suitable occasion and for my place in Parliament."

Baby-Farming Brutalities.

There is something awful, and yet withal pathetically touching, about the inside social secrets revealed in the course of the baby-farm investigations still going on in New York. In the house of Mrs. Dorran, where the poor unfortunates find a refuge in their hour of trial and shame, in one of the bedrooms there are four beds of straw on the floor only eighteen by twelve feet, whilst the ceiling can be touched by a man of middle stature. In the room back of this three more beds are crammed, leaving bare passage-room. Both of the upper floors are laid out thus, and the whole premises stand on a twenty-foot lot with a margin. It was on one of these beds of straw that the girl in her teens brought the little boy Charley into the world, whose death of starvation at Mrs. Kilbride's baby farm has created such a stir. The babe is said to have been so beautiful as to impress the recollection of its loveliness even on the mercenary wretches into whose hands it fell. It was compulsory that the young mother must find work to support herself, and to this end she consigns her infant to Mrs. Kilbride. Starving slowly to death, Mrs. Kilbride says of it: "Sure an' it didn't act dacint like, but it just threw its legs right up an' cried and squealed an' cried and squealed and nivver stopped, day nor night, but just went crying an' squealing, an' John Kilbride he puts his bed in the hall and says he, 'Nivver a wink will I get, Kate, till ye take that yellin' child to Mrs. Dorran.' So Kate Kilbride carries back the child to the house of Mrs. Dorran, but there it was refused admittance, and, to quote the Kilbride woman again, "the crying baby—bad luck to him, and John Kilbride he hadn't slept for two nights—an' he was in the arms an' a-squeelin' loss and me in this chair, which I gave $2 for next door, and then he grew quiet like, and John says, says he, 'Kate, the brat is dead'; and he was."

An Aristocratic Divorce Case.

Another divorce case in high life has recently been creating a stir in London. The petitioner in the case was Capt. Cecil Hughes, an officer in the Life Guards, who in 1870 married the daughter of a Belgian Baron and Baroness. The Captain met the Baroness Fantiquere and her two daughters at St. Leonards, and subsequently when they visited London he did his best to show them over the metropolis. This visit ended in the marriage of the younger daughter to the Captain, and after passing the honey moon abroad the petitioner joined his regiment at Windsor. They lived there up to 1872 on the happiest terms, when the Captain was advised to go abroad for his health, and it was arranged that Capt. Muirhead should accompany them. The latter named gentleman was an old friend of Mrs. Hughes and before her marriage there had been a strong attachment between them. The parties all left for Hamburg, and while there some matters occurred which excited the petitioner's suspicions, but the respondent laughed it off—telling him that it was a mere little bit of innocent flirting, and nothing more was said of it until Capt. Hughes's business required his presence in England. Previous to his departure he told his sister-in-law of his suspicions as to his wife and Capt. Muirhead, and enjoined her not to allow them to be together. Affairs went from bad to worse, however, and Captain Hughes, indignant at the treatment he had suffered from Muirhead, challenged that gentleman, and they fought at Boulogne, but the duel was a harmless one. He then commenced the suit, in which he claimed a divorce and damages from Muirhead for the wrong he had done him. The jury gave a verdict for the petitioner, with damages against Muirhead to the amount of $6,000.

Varieties of Robbery.

There are robbers, and robbers. From California comes a story of the genteel sort of highwaymanship. There a casual stage coach, with five passengers, was stopped and a bag demanded which was supposed to contain valuables. Pointing a pistol at Mr. Burnett, the driver, the robbers expected direct compliance, but he courteously descended, walked up to his visitors and opened the bag to show it was empty, telling the fellow to point his pistol in another direction. One of the highwaymen then climbed on to the driver's seat, but was no sooner told to go than he went. The five passengers inside were not interfered with, nor did they interfere. On his return journey Mr. Burnett provided himself with a pistol, and near the scene of his former ravet, are met a man and woman on horseback. He got down, walked up to them and begged them to throw up their hands, which they at once did, and having taken a Derringer from the man' pocket, the same which he had previously pointed at his own head, he told the woman she was no more a woman than he was, and persuaded her by his own six-shooter to accompany him to town. This is robbery on a civil and courteous basis; no violence anywhere. From Tennessee comes a different story of an unfortunate peddler whom four negroes enticed from the highway into the thick woods, bound him with strong cords to a tree, took his pack, and left him to die. He was held fast there a whole day and night, working all the time with his teeth. When he freed himself he was so injured as to be scarcely able to move, and wandered about in the woods five days without food, when he reached a farm-house and was there relieved and sent back to Memphis.
