Everybody knows what AIDS is, and most people are confident they won't get it as long as they feel they are not in one of the high risk categories.
[Everybody knows what AIDS is, and most people are confident they won't get it as long as they feel they are not in one of the high risk categories.]

[The fear of the disease has caused parents to withdraw their children from schools, parents and doctors and nurses refuse to care for AIDS patients. The would-be doctors and nurses at the university probably will not contact with AIDS more than any other profession. Are these students afraid that their future roles will bring them into contact with AIDS?
"There are nurses [in the field] that are scared," said Sue Sandziuk, president of the Nursing Students Association, "and who will refuse to care for a person with AIDS."
"I think I'm not scared of it so much because I have a better understanding of it now. I accept the roots of transmission. I am not in one of the groups that are typically diagnosed as having it....I feel I understand Dr. Louis Hugo Francescutti, the president of the Medical Association believes that "doctors after being constantly reassured that the study and research of this new disease in medicine and nursing reflect the different concerns AIDS is addressed in the Faculty of Nursing courses," said Sandziuk. Education of the nurses are being informed on how to protect "how to protect others and how to educate people, reduce the risk of AIDS is a top priority."
