What "Charlie Horse" and Sprains Are----How Treated

By DR. LEONARD KEENE HIRSHBERG,
A. B., M. A., M. D. (Johns Hopkins University).

DR. HIRSHBERG

"Charlie horse" is the name which arose perhaps when some Charlie took his first gallop on horseback. Forty-eight hours later or sooner, Charlie was doubtless stiff and sore. Muscles, tendons and ligaments which he had never jostled or used so severely previously were stretched beyond their habitual endurance.

The result of this kind of an experience is pain and soreness. Baseball players in their early spring training suffer "Charlie Horse" of the throwing arm, the calves and ankles. Swimmers, tennis players and others suffer similarly.

Sprains are sudden, abrupt injuries analogous to "Charlie Horse," but a bit more troublesome.

Wherever two or more bones come together they form a joint. The joint is surrounded by a closed sac called the joint capsule. This sac contains a slippery fluid which serves to lubricate the joint and permits the bones to move smoothly. The joint capsule is not sufficiently strong to prevent the bones from being torn apart, so additional strength is furnished to the joint by strong bands of tissue, which are known as ligaments. It will be noted that some joints, such as those in the fingers, move only backward and forward, while other joints, as, for example, the hip joint, will permit of movement in practically all directions.

Sprains are produced by a wrench or a twist of a joint, ankle, wrist, shoulder or knee.

There was an old saying that bad sprains were worse than fractures. As a matter of fact, many of these "sprains" are in reality small or partial fractures near the joint, especially when involving the ankle. In severe sprains of the shoulder, wrist or ankle an X-ray examination of the affected part should always be made. Sprains of the ankle in which extensive areas of black and blue skin are observed, extending for a considerable distance up the leg are almost always accompanied by fractures. There is severe pain, which is always increased by motion of the joint, and hence there is often apparent lack of ability to move the limb. Also there is swelling and sometimes redness, and later on possibly discoloration.

Complete Rest Necessary.

Absolute rest to the joint is imperative. If the sprain is at the wrist or shoulder, put the arm in a sling. If a knee or ankle is involved, put the patient to bed and rest the joint on a pillow. Hot water compresses, a thick dressing large enough completely to wrap around the joint and well above it are agreeable to the patient. Continue the compresses until the pain and swelling subside. Then cautiously begin rubbing with alcohol diluted with an equal amount of water. Later, in addition to the rubbing, which should become gradually more vigorous, begin gently to by an expert manipulator after X-rays show no broken fragment.

Severe sprains and strain which resist ordinary treatment have sometimes been greatly benefited by being baked in dry air at a very high temperature.

Strapping an Aid.

Sprains of the ankle joint are often treated by strapping with adhesive plaster. Take strips about an inch wide and apply them snugly to the sides of the ankle, running around the heel and to the sides of the foot encircling the heel. Be sure, however, to leave a strip of skin which is not covered by the plaster extending all the way up the front of the foot and ankle. The whole leg must not be encircled by the plaster. Plaster applied in this fashion makes in reality a flexible splint and gives considerable support to the joint. It can be worn for three or four weeks if necessary.

Physicians very frequently use plaster of paris casts in the treatemnt of severe sprains. The joint should be thoroughly protected by some resilient material such as a woolen bandage, a smoothly applied layer of cotton batting or a couple of thickness of cotton stocking. The cast is applied from just behind the toes to a little above the middle of the calf. Great care should be taken in putting the cast on that the circulation is not obstructed and the toes should be frequently examined in order to be certain of this point. If pain follows the application of the cast or the toes become blue or dark the cast should be immediately removed.

MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND
ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

What Betty Had To Say To Allen Drake.

"Well? How about it? Is it peace?" Allen Drake's tone held persuasive eagerness, though so low that I could scarcely distinguish the syllables. An involuntary glance at Lillian told me that she was rather ostentatiously rearranging the flowers in the low bowl near her, and I knew that she must not only be aware of our murmured conversation, but was markedly ignoring it.

There was only one way to put an end to the awkward situation. I raised my eyes to Allen Drake's with no hint in them of the resentment which still lingered in my heart.

"Peace, of course, and thank you," I said smiling.

"Thank you!" he murmured smiling back, then he turned to Lillian carelessly. "It's a wonder to me some hotel manager doesn't offer Betty about a million dollars a week and take her away from you," he said, with reminiscent admiration for the frapped chicken jelly.

"Sh-h-h!" Lillian whispered dramatically as the dining-room door swung open to admit the old colored woman in the picturesque garb she affects to her own satisfaction and the delight of all Lillian's guests.

She bore a tray from which arose the steaming savory odor of another culinary poem. There never is any formality about Lillian's small dinners, and from long experience I knew the surest way to Betty's heart, so I spoke promptly.

"Betty!" I exclaimed, "have you really those deviled crabs of yours?"

Mr. Drake's Plea.

"Ho, ho!" Betty boomed. "I'se jest got froo sayin' toh mahself out in de kitchen dat I'd bet you'd jump right out ob yoh skin w'en yoh seed dem crabs. Doan' yoh abah worry, Miss Madge. W'en ebah I knows yoh's due to eat heah I jes' takes mah foot in mah hand an' hustles up de tings yoh likes best."

She had deftly served the course as she was talking. As she came to Allen Drake's side he struck a reverential and pleading attitude and looked up at her, his fine eyes filled with laughing entreaty.

"Betty, I'm every bit as fascinating as Mrs. Graham, if you only knew it," he said. "Won't you adopt me, too?"

The old woman grinned in broad delight, but shook her head decidedly.

"Doan' know nuffin erbout yoh," she declared. "I doan' 'dopt nobody 'cept I've summered an' wintered 'em."

Mr. Drake turned to Lillian with an air of decision.

"This settled it," he said. "I shall get met a tent and camp on your doorstep until Betty declares I've 'summered and wintered' sufficiently to be adopted."

The old woman threw back her head and gave a chuckling laugh.

"You kaint come it over old Betty ef yoh does count yohself de beatinest man in all dis town," she said gleefully. Lillian's quiet voice punctuated her sentence.

Lillian Intervenes.

"I think I smell something burning, Betty."

"Oh, my good gracious!" She scuttled for the door, while her mistress strangled a laugh behind her serviette.

It is Lillian's invariable custom to permit the old colored woman to reply to the badinage of her guests until the conversation threatens to be embarrassing. Then she effectively gets rid of her by some absurd pretext, which Betty either believes or accepts with an understanding of why her mistress has given it.

"That's decidedly a score against you, Mr. Drake," Lillian laughed when Betty was safely in the kitchen.

"Yes, I'm still staggering under the blow," he returned. "The worst of it is that's the second time within a week that I've seen accused of having an exaggerated ego."

He was careful not to look at me, but I could feel my face flushing hotly. If he had said truthfully "within an hour," and named me as his accuser I could not have been more embarrassed.

Lillian cast one swift, curious glance at me, then looked away considerately.

"You must deserve it," she retorted lightly, then she changed the subject abruptly.

"What time did you tell me you would have that man on hand?"

Mr. Drake permitted a faint look of surprise to pass over his face. Lillian doesn't usually ask to have her memory jogged. But I knew that she had asked the question simply to divert his attention from my flushed face.

"One of my operatives will have him at the corner nearest that woman's house at half-past eight," he replied.
