HASZARD'S GAZETTE.

Saturday, September 16, 1854.

The Steamer Lady LeMarchant arrived early on Thursday afternoon with a British Mail. The Royal Mail Steamship Niagara arrived at Halifax on Tuesday morning last, in ten days from Liverpool. She brought 145 passengers, among whom were Mr. Henry Hazard and Daniel Davies for this place.

Bomarsund is taken, and it is to be regretted that the attack had not been made long since. The capture of the Isles of Aland, has completely dispelled the illusion that granite forms an impregnable fortress. On the contrary, it would seem that large blocks were driven out at once by the force of the shot, and that these were followed by discharges of debris, composed of loose stones, mortar, &c., compared by one of the writers, to shooting rubbish from a cart when the tail board is removed. Had the true nature of these fortifications been as well known as they are now, the appreciation of the difficulties that would attend the investment of Cronstadt would have been measured by a different scale. It is still hoped in England that Admiral Napier will attempt the demolition of Sveabourgh or Cronstadt, or perhaps both.

If those nearer the scene of action cannot account for the delay that has taken place in the Black Sea with respect to the attack on Sebastopol, we at this distance and with only borrowed lights, can not be expected to throw any illumination on the subject. One thing, however, we may venture to predict, and it is that when our gallant allies, and our own not less gallant men, have found that there are weak spots in even solid (!) granite walls, and that shelling and shotting them will not be like attacking a rhinoceros with muskets loaded with swan shot; they will go hopefully to work, and by exhibiting a little more of that beautiful shot and mortar practice, convince the Czar that unless he take timely measures of conciliation, his great, and hitherto supposed impregnable Empire, may fall to pieces like the fortress of Bomarsund. His allusion to the defeat of the elder Napoleon is not calculated to weaken the zeal, or depress the energies of his successor, but will rather nerve the arm and add vigor to the muscles of those who are burning to obliterate the remembrance of the retreat from Moscow, by writing upon the page of history in which it is recorded, a series of brilliant triumphs over Nicholas, that will throw their former reverses into the shade.

The Russians, it is said, have been more successful in Asia than in Europe: but now, that the Austrians have entered the Principalities, it is not improbable that Omar Pacha may take the command and the tables be turned.

Spain is still in an unsettled state. The Queen Mother Christina has, however, been permitted to depart. Her absence may, perhaps, contribute to restore quiet and order.

The crops in Great Britain are generally good, especially the wheat crops. The potatoe crops are abundant, and are of much superior quality to those grown for some years past. In Dublin the fields of wheat are said to be "dropping with richness." Reports of the potatoe crop are equally satisfactory.

The 54th, 66th, 71st (2nd bat.) and 72d regt, from Canada and Nova Scotia are under orders to England without being replaced by other corps.

In the London Quarterly Review, for July last, there is a very amusing article headed "The House of Commons," which gives a graphic account of the manner in which the public business, or the "Manufactory of Statute Law," as it is termed, is carried on. We have selected for our readers gratification a portion of this article and shall give an extract or two in succeeding numbers.

A good many years have elapsed since the attention of the country was very earnestly fixed upon the House of Commons, and during that period its place of meeting has been entirely changed, and some alterations have been introduced into its customs. As the generation which has arisen since 1832 is one which especially clamours for 'facts,' and is hardly satisfied to take a pin without being conducted through every room of the manufactory, and witnessing the process of wire-drawing, clipping, head-twisting, silvering, and sorting, let us so far fall into the habit of the day as to conduct Young England through the principal part of the Manufactory of Statute Law.

"Opposite to Ingenuus * sits the Speaker, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, an able man, whom everybody likes. Mr. Serjeant Yelverton being, in Queen Elizabeth's time, nominated to the office, rose and with much mock modesty disavowed his possession of any qualifications for the chair, 'for,' he said, 'he that supplieth this place ought to be a man big and comely, stately and well spoken, his voice great, his courage majestical, his nature haughty, and his purse plentiful and heavy.' The 'haughtiness' alluded to by Yelverton may be supposed to have meant loftiness, rather than the objectionable quality now implied in the word, and the whole description may be fairly applied to the present First Commoner. He was originally elected Speaker in 1839 on the retirement of Mr. Abercromby, upon which occasion he was chosen by 317 votes against 299 given for Mr. Goulburn. Since that time he has been thrice re-elected without opposition. When in active politics the right hon. gentleman voted for short Parliaments. Possibly his experience, in the chair, of the time it takes to drill a political recruit into a practical statesman may have induced the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel of the Hampshire Yeomanry to re-consider the question. To his right—and to our young friend's left—sit the Ministers on the foremost bench in front of a high table. That is Lord John Russell with the large hat. On one side of him sits Mr. Gladstone in black, and beyond is Lord Palmerston; on the other side of him are the lawyers and Sir James Graham. They are backed by the regular supporters of Government. Fronting them sit Her Majesty's Opposition: Mr. Disraeli, bounded by Sir John Pakington on this side and Mr. Walpole on the other, forms the centre and beyond the latter gentleman is Mr. Henley. The Conservative Opposition fill the benches behind. Two gangways occur, one on each side of the House, and below these and nearer to Ingenuus, on the Government side, sit the Manchester school, and, on the front row, men of some mark. The good Sir Robert Inglis used to occupy one of these seats. His successor, Sir William Heathcote, sits on one of the back rows opposite, near the Irish ultramontane party, of whom Mr. Lucas, an Englishman, is the only one of any real parliamentary talent. Some of the Irish members are below the gangway, on the Government side of the House—the O'Connells for instance, and others. The galleries along the sides of the House are for the members, who sleep there a good deal, and the gallery behind the Speaker is exclusively devoted to the members of the press. The brass grating above the reporter's sanctum conceals a row of very comfortable nooks in which, by favour of the Serjeant-at-Arms, ladies are placed. Little can be seen of them, a white handkerchief or a bright ribbon just making itself visible in the gloom, but they can both see and hear very well; and it would be better if they confined themselves to these two gratifications, instead of talking and laughing so emphatically. The putting them behind a grating, which really excludes them from the chamber, may perhaps be held their justification for considering that they are entitled to comport themselves as they please. Ladies are admitted into the House of Lords, and conduct themselves with a decorum which proves that the Commons might have ventured on a similar courtesy.

Almost every member is armed with a document of which he appears anxious to be rid as soon as possible. This is the time for presenting petitions. Ingenuus has seen the process of getting up a petition in his quiet country house, and remembers the pains that were bestowed upon the phraseology, the grave discussion whether it might not seem more respectful to the Commons to use the word 'regret' instead of 'deplore,' and what a struggle there was to get the phrase 'Roman Catholic brethren' inserted instead of 'Roman Catholic fellow-countryman,' and how the curates opposed it and the surgeon and lawyer supported it, and how, after a long squabble, they compromised with the 'Roman Catholic population of these islands.' How beautifully the petition was engrossed on parchment by one of Mr. Pounce's clerks, and how solemnly the leading signatures were affixed. How Mr. Hairsplit, the retired and serious attorney, signed, but affixed a protest that he did so in a sense only, and added several references to texts, that the House of Commons might look them up and quite understand his motives. How Mr. Quaver, the nervous gentleman, signed, but immediately afterwards wrote a long letter withdrawing his signature, and ultimately came to the post-office to affix it again, just as the petition was going away. And Ingenuus recollects, no doubt, the rest of the fidgeting, and hesitation, and self-complacency, and pomposity, with which the various other petitioners, according to their natures, performed the important duty, and how, finally, the solemn document was forwarded to the county member with letters, one to his club, the other to his private house, begging him instantly to acknowledge it, and to present it the first practicable moment. Now listen, for here comes a petition which has been prepared with similar awful care.

'Mr. Jones,' cries the speaker.

Up gets Mr. Jones. 'A petition, Sir, from the inhabitants of (name utterly inaudible), praying that the House will (several words utterly inaudible) Roman Catholics.' And Mr. Jones hurries up with the document while the Speaker is putting the formal question that it do lie upon the table, and a clerk seizes it and rams it into a carpet bag, and when the bag is quite full of petitions it is carried out of the House, and it is our firm belief that not one member ever read your petition, Ingenuus, or looked out one of Mr. Hairsplit's texts, but that it was hurried up and carried out in precisely the same ignominious way. See how fast the process is going on, and how the members run up, throw down their petitions, and run back. But this does not prevent petitions from being sent up by the thousand.

The list of a single night's petitions shows that the celebrated simile of the elephant's trunk, that can pick up a pin or root up an oak, precisely indicates the popular notion of the powers of the House of Commons. On the self-same night it is prayed to against church rates, against poor rates, against highway rates, against direct taxes, against indirect taxes, against the police, against interments in towns, against the closing of burial-grounds, against public houses, against the licensing system, against explosions in mines, against Temple Bar, against paper duties, against the war with Russia, against Lord Aberdeen, against the Court of Chancery, against tenants having to pay rent in Ireland, against keeping Sunday, against working over-hours; that the master of Killyleoscoyne work-house may be discharged; that the British Museum may be open seven days in the week; that the classics be no longer taught in public schools; that the brewers may be deprived of their monopoly; that British and not foreign music may be performed at Her Majesty's dinner parties; that third-class railway carriages may be made as luxurious as first-class; that primogeniture may be abolished; that a man may be at liberty to marry his grandmother; and that no person shall be hanged under any circumstances whatever.

But now comes a more stirring time. Questions are to be asked, and the Ministers are to answer them. There is a certain document, called 'the paper,' which is in every one's hand, and which is the programme of the business of the evening—a parliamentary play-bill. It is printed every day, and retains the Latin heading 'Saturnii, 29 die Aprilis, 1854' supposing that each Saturday were the day of sitting: Saturdays, however, are seldom invaded until late in the session. On this paper, after the orders of the day, comes a list of some such description as the following:

Mr. Lucas. To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has heard the report that a midshipman of H. M. S. Roarer, off the West India coast, remarked to a companion that the image of the Virgin in one of the Catholic churches at the Havana reminded him of the black doll over a marine store shop, and whether such midshipman is still retained in Her Majesty's service.

Mr. Williams. To ask the Chancellor of the exchequer whether the sums of money which he is perpetually advertising as receipts from Tender Consciences are really received, and if so, what is done with the money; and whether any instructions are given to the police to trace the senders, who, having obviously long pursued a dishonest career, seek to quiet their self-reproaches by such reimbursements.

Mr. F. French. To ask Lord John Russell whether he has any objection to explain to the House the whole designs of our Government in the conduct of the war, and to produce copies of all the secret instructions given to our commanders.

Mr. Haszard;

Sir,—On taking up a number of the Examiner newspaper a few days since, I felt a little amused or rather surprised, or reading an article in its columns on the efficiency of the present Keeper of Point Prim Light House, and the brilliant appearance of the said Light; also, contrasting the conduct of the last with that of the present Keeper. Now, Sir, happening to be present at a conversation which took place on Friday last, with Capt. Hewett, of the Schooner President, of Halifax, I will just relate, for the information of the writer of the article alluded to: that he stated that on Tuesday night the 5th inst., that he and his crew in vain endeavoured to make out the Light, but, in fact it was in total eclipse; and finally, was obliged to heave to, and, in consequence, was driven a considerable distance to the Westward. Now, Sir, had said Light been as it is reported to be by the Examiner, Capt. H. would have been enabled to make his Port shortly after daylight, whereas, he did not get in until the the following night at 9 o'clock. But, Sir, Tuesday being a fine harvest day, and, as I understand, the Keeper's Farm being some 15 or 16 miles from Point Prim, conclude, that he being much fatigued, and the day being fine, the night would be fine also, and he would not be missed from the station. Capt. H. speaks favorably of the Georgetown Harbour Light.

I remain,
Yours, &c.,
A true Liberal.
