A BONAPARTE DEAD.

An American Nephew of the Great Napoleon.

Romantic History of His Parents—Yankee Cash Came in Handy.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 8.—Col. Jerome Bonaparte, the well-known American and French army officer, and a grand-nephew of the great Napoleon, who died the other day at Beverly Farms, was a member of the famous so-called "American branch" of the historic Bonaparte family of France, his grandfather, Jerome, the younger brother of the great Napoleon, having married Miss Elizabeth Patterson, the daughter of a wealthy Baltimore merchant, Dec. 24, 1803. Jerome was the commander of a French warship and was on a visit to Baltimore at the time when he first met and became enamored of the American belle, who was a woman of great beauty.

The marriage was opposed by her parents as well as by the Emperor, the bridegroom's brother, who, although unable to prevent it, was so enraged at a Bonaparte contracting a plebeian union, he ordered that the young wife should not be permitted to set foot on the soil of France. Jerome seems to have been greatly attached to his wife, and for a long time to have resolved to give up all hope of performent under the Empire in order that he might live with her. But the Emperor was obdurate, and finally conquered in this matter as in others, so that a divorce was at length obtained, though the French Senate had already decreed that Jerome's American marriage was null.

Meantime a son had been born to the couple, July 7, 1805, named Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte. After the separation his mother, with the child in arms, returned to America. Young Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte grew up, graduated at West Point in 1848, and in 1854 went to France, where his kinsman, then on the throne, commissioned him a major of dragoons and he served in the Crimean war. While in Europe he met Mrs. Leroy Edgar, who had been left at 26 a widow with $1,000,000, and married her. She was a granddaughter of Daniel Webster, her father being W. H. Russell, a wealthy New York merchant.

In 1854 Colonel Bonaparte's father, the second Jerome, was presented with a certificate by the Napoleon then on the throne, certifying that the Patterson marriage was legal, and that Jerome Bonaparte should be "reintegre dans la qualite de Francais." This startling news aroused old Jerome, still alive at the age of 70, who had been married a second time to the daughter of the King of Wurtemberg. He protested that his American marriage was really null, but to no avail. In 1855 a conseil de famille decided that the American Bonapartes were legitimate for all purpose except the right of succession.

When Mme. Patterson Bonaparte died at an extreme old age, some twelve years ago, she left Col. Bonaparte $500,000, and to his younger brother, Charles Jerome Bonaparte, the balance of her large fortune. Col. Bonaparte had been for many years a summer resident of Newport, where, with his handsome and striking figure and bearing, and his equipages with imperial crest, he always attracted marked attention. This season his cottage "Harrison House" is leased and occupied by Sir Julian Pauncefote, British ambassador, and family.
