OF WORDS.

...ples to Show How ... the Study is.

...nnes City Times.

...words has always had a strang... ...ion for me. Ever since my old teacher, Prof. Lockwond, began to initiate the boys into the mysteries of Greek aspirate and to explain how great a debt our English language owes to the two races that lived so many centuries ago on opposing sides of the Adriatic, I have felt an ardent interest in the "roots" of words. Not that I ever revelled, as Dickens tells us Mr. Blimber did, in digging up those old roots in a sort of ghoulish fashion, but I must confess to a modicum of "ghoulish glee" in the discovery of a (to me) new derivation.

It is within the bounds of possibility (I suppose) that some one of our readers may not know the origin of so simple a word as "taffy," or "kickshaw," or "sa...e," or "hall," or "lady," to say nothing of "hocus-pocus" and "boulevard." Will you p...on me if I run the risk of telling you some...g you already know. Well, then, "taffy, ...ffy" as it is correctly spelled, is an ang...ed form of "tot-fait," signifying in French "soon made," an allusion to the quickness of the operation in converting the boiling molasses or syrup into candy. "Kickshaws" is a slight perversion of the French quelques choses (some things or "little things"). "Sincere" is a compound of two Latin words, "sine" and "cera" (without wax), and the origin is said to be as follows: In Oriental countries it was, in past ages, customary to mend broken water and oil jugs and jars with wax. When only cold or tepid liquids were poured into the mended vessels the latter held firmly, their contents, but if filled with hot water the cracks would open. Hence a "sine-cera" or "sincere" jug was one without wax. You can readily see how the word acquired from that old custom its present signification.

"Hall" is believed to have been an early English or Saxon form of "all," and was applied to the main passage through the house from the entrance to the rear, because in those days the "hall" was the general meeting place for everybody in the house, the master and his family, his retainers and his guests. "All" gathered there, it was "the place for all." Of course you know that our modern word "entry" (substituted by many Americans for "hall") is from the French entrer.

Ruskin tells us that "lady" meant originally "bread-giver." The "lady of the manor," the chatelaine in France, was the bread-giver, the almoner, the dispenser of alms to her dependents and presumably to the wandering "tramps"—if they had such in early English days. ("Troubadours" they called themselves in some European lands, and "trouveres," "trovatore" and "menstrel" in others).

The word "hocus-pocus" is said to have this origin: In the elevation of the host during the celebration of mass, the priest was accustomed (and is still, I suppose), to say hoc est corpus (this is the body). When the Reformation occurred in Germany and other European countries some of the opponents of priestly rites and forms denounced this ceremonial, and said of it that it was "all hocus-pocus," coining a word by running together the words hoc est corpus in rapidly pronouncing them, so that it sounded very much like "hocus-pocus." From this arose the custom of speaking of all ceremonials regarded by the speaker as meaningless and perhaps misleading as "all hocus-pocus." A slightly different meaning has been gradually given to this word by the process of evolution, I suppose.

"Boulevard" is a corruption and compound of two French words, "boule" (ball) and "verte" (green). When the walls built around Paris during the long reign of Louis XIV. were razed to the ground at about the end of the last century, portions of the earthworks were converted into promenades, and on the top of these earthworks the young men of Paris used to play at bull. Hence these spots were called "boule-vertes" or "bowling-greens," and from that was derived the modern French word boulevart or boulevard. It is spelled correctly either way, though the pronunciation is exactly the same in each case.

In this connection it is interesting to note how we subvert words from their original meaning in introducing them from foreign tongues. For instance, the French never use "depot" in the sense which we do; with them it means a place of deposit, as a military depot or a storehouse; what we call a "depot" is a "gare" or "station" in France. They never cry "encore" at the theatre or any place of amusement. When they wish to award praise to an actor and ask the repetition of a "morceau," they shout "Bis! Bis!" (twice).

Another little eccentricity of the French language and Frenchmen is that they make the hosiery of women masculine ("bas"), while that of men is feminine ("chaussettes").

By the way, will some one of our million readers be good enough to give me a good English translation, expressed in one or two words—no more—of "coiffer," or of "chic," or "toilette," or of the German "gemuthlichkeit?"

A Quaker's Prayer for a Warrior.

From The Albany Argus.

Quaker Deacon Henderson of Philadelphia, accompanied by his wife, was among the Capitol corridor strollers yesterday. Deacon Henderson wore a stove-pipe hat of the vintage of the year one and, according to the Quakerish antiquated custom, would not take his hat off. But when he reached the room containing the military curiosities Deacon Henderson was especially impressed when he stood upon the dais upon which rested the remains of Gen. Grant when they were in state in the Capitol. The good Quaker deacon was so impressed that he knelt before the dais and for five minutes prayed silently for the departed illustrious hero. Tears streamed down his cheeks. His hands were clasped before him and everybody present was silent and paid their respects to the veneration of the Quaker for Gen. Grant by not moving about, but waited quietly until he was through. Quaker Mrs. Henderson did not seem to be especially impressed, for when her husband knelt upon his knees she very hastily left the room and waited in the corridor outside until the good deacon was through his prayer.
