TALENT.

Know Your Business Well.—If there is one thing, which a young man, beginning life should realize more than another, it is the necessity of knowing his business well. It may seem, at first sight, that advice of this character is needless, for that every one would naturally seek to know his business well. Experience proves, however, that more persons fail from want of a thorough knowledge of their business, than from any other cause. It is, in fact, our own folly, far more than the villainy of strangers, that brings a misfortune upon us. A merchant thinks it enough for him, for instance, if he knows how to sell his goods, forgetting that it is as requisite to be informed of the means of his customers, and the amount of trade his capital will warrant, of the currency laws, and of political economy, of the chances of a coming financial convulsion, and of the changes in taste. A mechanic supposes that he is competent, if he can make articles as his predecessors made them, to the ignoring of all modern improvements.—Such men, whether merchants or mechanics, must either fail altogether, or come short of the success that might otherwise have been theirs.

Yet we do not exaggerate in saying that a majority of mankind belong to this class. Three men out of five do not know their business well.

Thorough should be the word, however, in everything. No Greek ever ventured compete at the Olympic games until he had gone through a thorough training. A thorough-bred horse will trot a common one to death, not only because he is generally himself well trained, but because in him training has become hereditary, and runs in his blood. One of the most eminent lawyers that ever lived remained for years without a case of importance; but instead of wasting his time in idleness or dissipation, he studied hard through all this weary waiting; and at last, when a great case arose, involving some very abstruse question, he knew how to master it, which few others did—and so, in a single day, made favor and fortune. Too many young men think because business is light, it is useless to be at the office, store or shop, and therefore lounge at club rooms, taverns or bowling saloons, or ride out into the country, and thus squander both time and money. Such is not the way to success in business. Such is not the method to earn an honorable name. Success, no matter at what, can only be earned by a thorough knowledge—and that can be obtained only by close application by hard work. Of two young men beginning life together, that one is sure to be wealthy first who knew his business the best, for he gets rich by knowing where to save, and making a profit, therefore, in little things, of which the other is ignorant—Know your business well.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Detective Cat.—A lady residing in a fashionable neighbourhood in Liverpool, has a favorite cat. The lady never returned home after the shortest absence, without being joyfully received by her favorite, who comes forward to receive the affectionate caresses of her mistress. On Sunday, after returning from church, the lady was surprised that pussy did not receive her as usual, and the continued absence of tabby made her a little uneasy. The servants were all appealed to, but not one of them could account for the absence of the cat. The lady thought she would make a strict search for her feline friend, and, descending to the lower story, was surprised to hear calls of "puss, puss," answered by the mewing of the cat. After looking about for some time, it was discovered that the sounds proceeded from the wine cellar, which had been properly locked and the key placed in safe custody. As the cat was in the parlour when the lady left for church, it was not necessary to consult a wise man to ascertain that the servants had clandestine means of getting into the wine cellar, and that they had forgotten, when they themselves retired, to request pussy also to withdraw. The contents of the cellar are not likely for some time to come to disappear so quickly as they have latterly done.

Consumption of Iron.—The annual consumption of iron is estimated at seven millions of tons.—Of this great aggregate, Great Britain produces about one half and consumes one-fourth. The figures are thus stated:

Great Britain,	-	3,586,000
United States,	-	1,000,000
France,	-	650,000
Belgium,	-	950,000
Russia,	-	675,000
Sweden and Norway,	-	119,000
Italy,	-	72,000
Austria,	-	600,000
Prussia,	-	200,000
Denmark,	-	20,000
Germany,	-	20,000
Spain,	-	27,000
Total,		6,890,000

The rest of the world in Asia, Africa, and America, furnishes too little to be computed; but it may possibly raise the aggregate production to 7,000,000 tons; while the increased profit, in its manufacture (if wrought iron,) of thirty dollars per ton, but the successful method of Mr. Salter, of Newark, N. J., by his new furnace, would amount to the formidable sum of 200,000,000 of dollars a year, as we learn from those well versed in the subject.—State of Maine.

A New Dodge.—On Saturday last a respectable looking man took his stand close by the weighing house in Plymouth market, and held in his hand a large and elegant snuff-box full of wedding rings, and began the following tale, as nearly as our correspondent could relate:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am sent here from a party of gentlemen, who are waiting for me at the hotel, to sell this number of gold rings in one hour. My friends don't let this opportunity slip for you may depend upon it they are gold and the wager is heavy. Look at the wager of the great Berkley of the 100 savs. that were to be sold in one hour; those that bought them for 1d. found them real gold-savs., but the wager was lost, and I am afraid I at the wager will be lost.' Of course the rings were soon bought by those eager to hear his tale. He said the ramping lion was all stampedon them, but turned out to be a dog with a curly tail. He also said, "To-morrow you will see this wager in the papers." Every now and then he put hand to his hat, as if the gentlemen were watching him, and then he would say, I am watched, that I don't sell more than one to each person, and to no person under fifteen years. All the rings were soon sold, and of course there is no occasion to say that they turned out to be good brass.—Plymouth (England.) Journal.

PRACTICAL CHIVALRY

Place aux dames.—We admire the silent chivalry which seeks to protect the fragile physique of woman from the attacks of disease, and to shield her from its consequences, much more than the boisterous bravery of the duellist who is proud to fight in her behalf. Hence we consider Professor Holloway, the great medical discoverer, whose remedies have been of such incalculable service to the sex, entitled to their warmest gratitude. It is beyond question that in all the variant and complicated forms of disease to which they are subject, Holloway's Pills may not only be administered with safety, but with a full assurance of favorable results. The murderous mineral preparations of the day, disastrous as they are to men, are still more fatal to women. Calomel and blue-pill cut off in early womanhood, and in the prime of life, the fairest flowers of many a household. We say to every wife, mother and daughter, avoid them as you would a violent poison; for, although slower in their operation, they are not less deadly in the end. Holloway's Pills, on the other hand, gently stimulate the enfeebled vital organs, brace the relaxed nerves, invigorate the digestive powers, purify the blood, and regulate every internal function. There is no period in the life of the sex, from childhood to old age, no disorder, special or general, to which they are subject, that does not come within the curative scope of Holloway's specifics. If ulcers, eruptions, or exfoliations disfigure the dainty envelope on whose purity, smoothepess, and transparency feminine beauty so much depends, the Ointment will banish them as surely as the Summer shower washes the dust from the blossoms; while the Pills, acting at once as an antiseptic and invigorate, will relieve the internal fluids of every morbid taint, and give a new and healthful impulse to the living laboratory which eliminates them, and the wonderful machinery which propels, distributes and adapts them. Provided with Holloway's Pills and Ointment, the sex may discard their cosmetics, and secure the permanent enjoyment of their natural comeliness, by securing the health of which a clear complexion and sparkling eyes are the visible [illegible] *Y.
