TAXES.

RATEPAYERS OF THE CITY OF London are requested to take notice that for 1894 they may, if desired, pay their taxes in two installments, the first of which must be paid during the first 30 days of August, and the second during the first 30 days of October. Ratepayers paying the installments as they become due according to the above dates, will not be charged interest, nor will discount be allowed. If either of the said installments is not paid during the time above specified, a 5 per cent charge will be immediately added thereto. Any ratepayer paying the whole of his taxes during the first 30 days of August will be allowed a discount of 3 per cent off the second installment, the payment of which he might have deferred till October. Rates amounting to less than $6 are not subdivided. The collectors are not authorized to receive the second installment until the first installment, with all charges thereon has been paid. Special attention is directed to the fact that in order to enable the council to satisfactorily close its own financial year, the collectors have been directed by bylaw to return the rolls for 1894 to the city treasurer on the 15th day of December next, so that if the installments are not paid as above specified, they must be collected previous to December 15th, with the 5 per cent added. When paying your taxes, bring marked check or even change. Do not wait to pay your taxes till the 30 days have nearly expired; by so doing you will run the risk of being crowded out in consequence of the inability of the collectors to receive same. Pay as early in the month as you can. The 5 per cent charge must be added after the expiration of the 30 days without considering the cause of or reason for non-payment. By order

DOWN THE THAMES!

Beauty Spots Near at Hand.

Scenic Attractions Close by London.

This was how I discovered the River Thames: Sapphira came from Toronto to pay us a visit, and with her she brought a vast collection of sketching pads, shiny tubes of paint, portable easels and brushes big and little, expressive of a fierce determination to do something in the artistic line before she left us. Sapphira, who always singles me out as her hostess when there is anything special she wants done, soon had me scurrying around for something to paint. A scene "with water in it" was the demand this time, which of course turned my mind to the rumor of a bit of river in the vicinity. Inquiries brought to light the fact that a comfortable little steamer made the sail down as far as the waterworks several times a day. I decided at once to take Sapphira on this trip first, as an experiment, and then if she saw anything she liked on the way we might go down another day in a small boat or drive out along the bank and make sketches. The fact that Sapphira's curling tongs refused to heat as quickly as was their wont caused us to reach the wharf at the foot of Dundas street a trifle after starting time, and when all hope seemed lost we had an exciting race down the planks and were hauled on board much to the edification of onlookers by the gentleman who manipulates the ropes and the gangway with great skillfulness.

Fifteen minutes later and we had discovered the Thames! I felt aggrieved. "To think", I said to Sapphira, "that all this while there has been a little gem of a river and beautiful landscape, with the means of taking a comfortable trip down it at almost any hour of the day, and yet no one has thought it worth while to mention the fact all the two years I've lived in London." "Well, you've never remained in town so late in June before, have you? Perhaps they didn't happen to think of it," answered Sapphira, soothingly, to calm my ruffled feelings. "But it is a darling little river, a charming little stream," she added, warming up as our bark having fairly passed all the mudbanks and small back yards, now brought into view a most delicious bit of pastoral landscape. After this the prospect grew more and more beautiful with every turn of the river, which winding in and out among the smiling fields stretching away on either side of us, drew forth strange and mysterious ejaculations from Sapphira, such as "Ah, there's a scheme of color for you!" "Charming values in that wheat field!"; but when I, to keep up my part in the conversation, cheerfully remarked that "Crops were looking very well indeed, and I shouldn't wonder if wheat brought in a good price this year," the classical nose of the pet pupil at Dauber's renowned academy of paint slinging, was visibly affected, and its owner hardly deigning to reply, acquainted me with the fact that the word "values" has quite another meaning in artistic circles from what I supposed it to have, and so I was quite sat upon for the space of a minute and a half and seemed to feel the crushing weight of opinion upon all Philistines, held by the charmed circle at the above-mentioned Dauber's. But presently recovering from the blow dealt her at the hand of a friend Sapphira lost herself once more in raptures on the beauties of our Thames Valley. "We have nothing like it in Toronto," she cried—"nothing but the lake, the everlasting old lake. A monotonous waste of water stretching away in all directions. I prefer a river; no matter how small it is—so much more variety." I thought this sounded rather well, coming from a Torontonian. As a rule they are inclined to be uppish, on account of advantages in the way of a bay, an electric car system and trifles of that nature. Well, as I may have said before I was quite intoxicated; that afternoon I discovered the Thames and all its hitherto unsuspected beauties. It was something equivalent, I think, to the delightful emotions one experiences upon moving into a house in the winter and learning from the boy who brings the groceries that that small, leafless sprig of a tree which you never noticed before in the corner of your back yard will bear fine peaches next summer, "extra juicy and sweet." (We wonder how he knows.) Or if I liked I might compare my selfish, delicious sense of gain to the opening of an oyster shell, wherein lies concealed a big, fat pearl. Not that I would think for a moment of comparing this London, Ontario, of ours to an oyster shell, but —— but you know yourself what a nuisance it is trying to find the right simile at the right moment in this world of ours. Perhaps it was this pleasant sensation which I have just described of discovering something nice which you may take and never know you possessed before, coupled with a soft and melting sense of pleasure in moss-carpeted groves checkered with sunlight, the unspeakable blue of a Canadian summer sky when holding in its depths a few fleecy clouds, the hills of the waterworks rising in the distance mysterious and purple—that was the means of causing me to stop and reflect on the likelihood of this enchanting journey through Arcadia being at my disposal all summer, and if there was any possible reason why the steamer might cease to run. One could not fail to notice upon looking about that while on board there were present just about enough people to suit a selfish passenger, perhaps from Capt. Foster's point of view (the owner of the boat) somewhat more than a crowd might not be unacceptable. I broached this subject presently to Sapphira and asked her what she thought of the plan of writing to the newspapers, and giving a hitherto most unappreciated local attraction its due. Now, one of my dear friend Sapphira's most valuable qualities as a companion is her positive genius for putting her finger on the weak spot in any proposition you like to bring forward. At once she was able to show me how imbecile such a course would be. "Where would you put your feet?" was the curt question with which she greeted my proposal, adding coldly: "Perhaps you think we'd be sitting here so nice and comfortable, like we are now, with a camp stool apiece to put our feet upon, and one for my parasol and things, and two more for yours, if this deck was covered with women and babies." Sapphira is so pithy! I had to stop and think for a few minutes. It did seem too bad to give the whole thing away to the madding crowd, thus losing the chance of being able to hoist one's feet in peace and quiet. But suppose Capt. Foster should stop running the boat because enough people didn't patronize it, how about my premediated weekly trip for the rest of the summer? But I kept on thinking for quite a while longer and at last it came. "Sapphira," I said, meekly, "do you know I don't believe even if I should write an article for the papers that quite the whole town would be on the wharf the next day. Of course everyone would come who could after reading it, but a few might be sick or dying." I paused for her to reply; I waited for quite a while; but Sapphira held up her pencil and took measurements of a cow on the opposite bank switching her tail in the long grass; and then the harpers in the bow played "Love's Golden Dream" very softly, and our boat glided and the river gleamed and so did the tin cover of a box of lunch lying on Sapphira's cloak, which reminded us to look in and see how the sandwiches were getting on, which caused us to recollect that there had been something very unsatisfactory about that last meal we had partaken of in the midst of our family, and then no further attempt at conversation was made for some little time. But later on when were wandering through the beautiful woods at Springbank Sapphira observed apropos of nothing that she suspected there was an absolute dearth of artistic feeling about Londoners, or they would have been down long ago in a glorious mob to uproot that hideous advertisement of soap, disfiguring what looked as if it might have been the most alluring prospect for a sketch along our route, and that if an angel from heaven were to sit down and write to the papers, telling them not to go abroad to seek beauties, but to look about them they would not be convinced. But I took this to be a bit of Torontonianism showing itself in Sapphira, and decided in the face of the fact that no citizen of London has ever felt sufficiently jarred upon by the vulgar defacing of one of our prettiest views to make a protest that I would try to arouse Londoners to the realization that close at home we have a charming river (when it is not dried up), beautiful scenery, and comfortable steamers with obliging officials, practically just as good as you often put up with when away from home.

STREET WATERING BY ELECTRICITY.

(Ottawa Journal.)

Toronto is succeeding very well with its plan of watering the principal streets by the aid of the trolley. King street, Yonge street and other leading streets on which the electric cars run are watered from a tank run by electricity along the car lines. The tank is an ordinary iron arrangement on a truck with a trolley pole on top. It slips along the streets at the same rate of speed as the street cars, and moving so rapidly the water has not time to dry on one end of the street before the tank has reached the other end. By this simple but ingenious system the corporation saves a large annual outlay.

No Cause of Wonder.

Wonder has been expressed at the rapid growth of the sales of Eseljay's Liver Lozenges. The secret of their great success is in the fact that they do not react and weaken like pills and other laxatives. It should be rather a wonder that people will use any other medicine for stomach and liver troubles. They are sold at 25 cents a box, or five boxes for $1.

A FRENCH statistician says that the number of men and women in France is more nearly equal than in any other country in the world, there being only 1,007 women to 1,000 men. In Switzerland there are 1,064 men to 1,000 women, and in Greece only 933. The conditions in Hong Kong, according to this authority, are "appalling," there being only 366 women to 1,000 men.
