horrors, will cracher, with all its sickening antecedents, on the pavement at your feet.—This last disgusting habit seems as natural to him as it is to his favorite limacon. The most polite men I met in Paris were the old priests; the young ones were surly enough, with a chained devil in their eye, not too pleasant to look at.—From "London Society."

Sea-Loving England.

Centuries of civilization, that have brought in their train luxury, shopkeeping, and a marvellous commerce that demands for its maintenance the work of hand and brain, have not extinguished that passion to which our country owes its greatest glory. Man and boy, the Anglo-Saxon race loves the sea.—At heart we are sailors yet. Not long ago I visited what was once my school playground. Lying under an old elm tree reading in the soft light of a tranquil summer evening, I saw a pale-faced boy. His limbs were small, his face delicately white, and his eyes of the mildest blue. No one would have supposed him to be a boy of much spirit; but a little conversation soon showed that a heart fired with the spirit that anamated those grand old sailors of Devon, whose lives he was reading, beat beneath his jacket. He was panting for the sea. For weeks his reading had been the histories of sea-fights, voyages and travels, shipwrecks and storms, desert islands, and wild adventures among strange people, speaking strange tongues, hiding in dense forests, paddling on broad, expanding rivers flowing under the shadows of huge mountains.—Volume upon volume that spake of these things he had devoured by day; at night he had realized them in dreams, and with the morning awoke with with the sea fever still upon him. Had he been a less carefully disciplined boy than he was he would undoubtedly have contributed his mite to that mighty list of English lads who "ran away and went to sea." Speak to him of hardships he would have to bear, dangers to undergo, difficulties to surmount, and he would tell you these were the things he wanted.

What I have called the sea-fever in the pale-faced boy is an experience which most of us have. It comes as surely as the measles, and generally lasts rather longer. It is common to youth but not confined to any particular age. Like an epidemic, it rages fiercely, and is catching; it runs through a household, a coterie of friends, or a school. When it comes, Greek and Latin grammars, geographies, and arithmetic books are detestable and might as well be put away. What are they to the achievements of Cooke, Columbus, and Drake!

"Oh, papa, do let me go for a 'middy,'" is the cry that has startled many a Paterfamilias who has designed a seat in the bank, or the counting-house, or a University career for his son. But since there are required but a very small number of midshipmen, the boys generally have to take to the desk or college, the pupit or bar, or sick-chamber; and though this yearning for the adventurous life of the sea rately dies out, it is softened by time, and the lads who thought of running away to Liverpool become excellent parsons, active lawyers, and unromantic medical men.—From "London Society."

There is a difficulty between the civilians of London and the men of Major Penn's "gray battery" of artillery, stationed in that garrison. Several fierce encounters took place between bodies of them on Saturday and Monday nights last.
