HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE
BY MAY CHRISTIE

VIII.—Travis Lloyd At Home.

Alice took me to my room as soon as we had explained the accident to her.

"It's going to be a ghastly week-end," she remarked, switching on the lights, "what with illness in the house and everything upset, there'll be no fun at all! Helene!"—she wheeled me round so that the electric bulbs shone full on me—"you look for all the world as though you'd seen a ghost!"

I marveled at her. Jim, hovering between life and death—and she wearing the diamond bracelet he had given her, could talk like this!

"My dear, you must have some tea at once!" A ray of human compassion seemed to gleam in Alice's blue eyes. She rang the bell. "You'll have some supper later on. We finished dinner half an hour ago. I really didn't expect you till 9:15."

She helped me out of my traveling dress, and into a pretty evening gown. But, oh, what a mockery it all was! Suppose Jim shouldn't recover? I dared let my mind dwell on that thought.

I drank the tea her maid brought to me. Then Alice and I descended to the dining-room.

Tony was there, with some week-end guests of the Anstruthers.

He got up as we entered.

"Sit down, Helene." The caressing note was in his voice. His eyes were fixed upon my face. "You needn't worry too much about that poor chap that you rescued. The doctor says he'll pull through all right, provided he has good nursing, and perfect quiet."

Alice wheeled round.

"And how," she drawled, "is he to get either commodity in this house?"

Tony looked ashamed of her.

"The doctor telephoned for a nurse, and sent the car to meet her. Luckily, there's an excellent woman at a house about six miles away. She ought to be here in half an hour. As for the 'perfect quiet' that's needed for the patient, Mr. Travis Lloyd very sensibly suggests that we all go over for the week-end to his place."

Alice looked relieved. Hard-hearted creature, she couldn't possibly have cared for Jim!

"That's a good scheme. My housekeeper is so splendid, she can manage the servants quite well without me. And Thorny Grange is a wonderful house to visit. Do let's go!"

No longer could I keep silence.

"I prefer to stay and help the doctor and the nurse." My voice was not quite steady as I spoke. And tears were in my eyes. I couldn't possibly leave Jim.

"Don't be a little goose, Helene. What do you know of nursing? Besides, the man's a perfect stranger to you." Alice's tones were mocking. And her stare was insolent. She made it evident that she considered my offer to be presumptuous.

Oh, if she only knew the truth!

At this psychological moment, Travis Lloyd, accompanied by the doctor, came into the room.

Again I repeated my offer. The doctor shook his head.

"We don't need you in the meantime. I've engaged a first-class nurse. And the housekeeper here is a level-headed woman. She'll help, too."

I think he noticed how my face fell, for he added, kindly:

"Go over to Thorny Grange with the others, and I promise you that if we need extra assistance, I shall phone for you."

Nothing more was to be said. With this small crumb of comfort I had perforce to be satisfied.

Thorny Grange was a dear old rambling house, set in magnificent grounds. Isolated in position, it formed a quaint retreat from the tumoil of the outer world.

We were a subdued little party that evening, the week-end guests from Anstruther Lodge.

"Come on—let's have a game of bridge," suggested Alice, dragging Tony from my side. "The others are waiting for us in the library."

I saw her husband raise his eyebrows, critically. He hates his wife to play for money. But Alice loves the excitement of the game.

"Miss Beauclaire, may I have the honor of showing you around my house?" Travis Lloyd, immensely courteous, stood before me. He had followed us to Thorny Grange. The worried look that the evening's adventures had brought to his attractive face was beginning to vanish now. He smiled at me.

I complied with his request. Indeed, I was glad of anything that would take my mind from Jim—poor Jim!

"You ought to be a very happy man," I said impulsively, pausing before some priceless paintings in his picture gallery.

"Happy?" He gave an odd little laugh, looking sideways at me. "Is anyone really happy in this world?"

The cynicism of his words amazed me. But before I could reply to his strange question, he went on:

"Of course a girl like you is happy—I make an exception in your favor! You are made for happiness."

I stared at him, amazed. I? Made for happiness? Why in the whole of England there wasn't a sadder girl that night than I. Helene Beauclaire, the unacknowledged wife of Jim St. Aubyns!

"You have everything the average human being longs for," resumed this strange man, watching me intently, "youth, beauty, health and charm. A clean of friends. Success in social things, and in your recent stage career. And"—here he lowered his voice—"freedom and—love——"

Freedom? And love? I could have laughed aloud. Neither of these things were mine!
