QUEER STORY OF AN ATTORNEY.

A certain prosecuting attorney in the interior of New York state, in relating stories of his youth, told the writer the following:

The business of a very busy week was over, and I was sitting one Saturday night, enjoying a few moments' relaxation, when an old merchant insisted on seeing me. Mr. Nesmith was very rich, and commanded respect outwardly from the community, but I, who knew his inner life, was aware that he pursued a course of dissipation and profligacy illy suited to his years and standing. He was in a state of great excitement and indignation, and was determined to get a warrant for the arrest of his confidential clerk, William Stonington, on a charge of embezzling $1700.

The young man had been in his employment for years, and bore an unspotted character. I knew him well, and would not credit the accusation. Therefore I refused a warrant until Monday, when I could examine into the matter.

Mr. Nesmith, late in life, had married a very pretty girl, and was thought to dote upon her, while she was delighted at being "an old man's darling." She was one of those guileless creatures who seem all innocence and confidingness.

On Monday morning, while I was awaiting Nesmith, his wife was announced, and requested a conversation.

Like her husband, she was extremely agitated, but from a different cause. After much stammering, blushing, and circumlocution, I drew from her that she wanted a warrant to arrest her husband for adultery. I was thunderstruck! I argued that there must be some mistake—that his devotion to her was well known. She laughed ironically, and condemned that their apparent happiness was all a mockery to deceive the world; that in reality they lived a cat-and-dog life; but for their children they would long ago have separated, but that now forbearance ceased to be a virtue. She had, she averred, the most convincing proofs of his infidelity.

When I demanded what they were, she replied that her physician would inform me. I tried to appease her, but in vain. All I could do was to put her off until the following Monday.

She had scarcely left the office when her husband called about the clerk's embezzlement, as I supposed. He, too, wished to consult me in the most confidential manner—not about the Stonington matter, but about his wife! He had discovered that she was untrue to him! I was even more thunderstruck than at the wife's charge, and when I inquired, as in her case, what proofs he could adduce, he replied to the same effect as she had. However, I managed to put him off until the ensuing Tuesday on that matter, and the next day on that of the clerk.

The next morning back came Mrs. Nesmith. I told her she was before the appointed time, but she said she had another matter to consult me about, and very important. It was just after New Years, and her bill had been sent in by the principal dry goods merchant of our city. On examining the articles she found a silk dress and a shawl charged to her she had never got, but she had seen them worn by Miss Parmenter, a young woman who had been in her house a couple of years as governess and seamstress. Evidently the woman had obtained the goods on false pretences, and she wanted her arrested.

This was getting pretty thick. I dismissed her for a few days, promising her faithfully that the affair should be attended to, and justice meted out to the guilty party. I sent for my shrewdest detective and put this complicated case into his hands.

He succeeded in ascertaining the whereabouts of the missing clerk, and determined beyond a doubt that the silk dress and shawl were, as charged by the wife, in possession of the governess. When I had got the whole story I sent for all the parties concerned, inviting them separately, and without the knowledge of the other, to come to my office at a certain hour on a certain day.

They came in one by one, looking aghast and turning white as they discovered each other's presence.

When they were all assembled I addressed them individually, without explaining anything or making any preliminary remarks. I first addressed myself to the old man, saying:

"Mr. Nesmith, you wanted a warrant against this clerk for embezzlement?"

"Yes, sir," he answered, severely.

Young Stonington nearly jumped from his chair with astonishment and indignation.

"Mrs. Nesmith, you wanted a warrant against your husband for infidelity?"

"Yes, sir," she said, stoutly, "and I'll have it, too."

Nesmith could only stammer out:

"What!"

"And you, sir, wanted a warrant against your wife for infidelity?"

"What!" she gasped, looking as if she was going to faint.

"Yes, sir, and I will have it," said Nesmith. Then I continued speaking to the wife, pointing to the seamstress, who, the picture of innocence, had, up to this, kept looking from one to the other as if to ask how all this turpitude concerned her. "And you furthermore, Mrs. Nesmith, wanted to arrest Miss Parmenter for obtaining goods under false pretences!"

As Mrs. Nesmith bowed assent, the seamstress started from her seat pale with fright and amazement. I did not spare them in the explanations I made them of this quadruple imbroglio. First, I showed that the husband had been maintaining for some time illicit relations with the pretty seamstress; had presented her with the dress and shawl, and by some fatal oversight had omitted to caution the salesman not to put the items in his wife's bill.

After the wife had expressed her triumph at having been right as regarded her husband's laxity of conduct and lamness of principle, I adduced conclusive proof of her liason with Stonington, from whose indiscriminate amorous tendencies sprang that indubitable evidence which convinced both husband and wife of each other's infidelity. As to the matter of the embezzlement, it appears that on the Saturday afternoon prior to his call on me in the morning, the old merchant had had $1700 in his pocket-book in the lower outside overcoat pocket to take to the bank for deposit. But being somewhat the worse of liquor, he sat down by the office stove, fell asleep, and the pocket-book dropped to the floor. He awoke in half an hour and hurried to the bank. Arriving there he found no pocket-book. It was 3 o'clock. He went back to the store, made enquiries, and was told by the porter that Stonington had been seen to rush out of the store very excitedly with the pocket-book in his hand, and had not been seen since.

A general search was made for the clerk, but he could not be found. He was, however, traced to the railroad depot; hence came the application for the warrant.

The facts were, the clerk entering the office after the old man had left, found the pocket-book on the floor, guessed in a minute what had happened, and rushed after the merchant, but could not find him. A telegraph boy met him on the street with a dispatch informing him that his mother was dying, and that if he wished to see her alive he must take the next train.

He had only a few moments in which to catch it, so he scrawled a few lines to the old merchant explaining all the circumstances, and gave the note to the boy, who promised to deliver it without delay, but never delivered it at all. The clerk jumped on the train, taking the pocket-book, of course.

The sickness and death of his mother had detained him at his country home until he was sent for by me, when he lost no time in coming back, and then and there returned the pocket-book and its contents intact.

As they were all in the same boat, no one of them could reproach the other, so there was a general forgiveness. Husband and wife kissed and made up; the young seamstress was discharged with a cordial certificate of good character. The mutual doctor's bill paid by the husband without demur or comment, and by the merchant the young clerk was liberally furnished with capital to go west and start in business for himself, which he did and prospered and married.

The scandal was hushed up—not a breath of it ever transpired to the general public, and husband and wife showed the liveliest gratitude to me for my pains in the matter, whenever and wherever they met me—by cutting me dead.
