POLICE SCANDAL STIRS NEW YORK

Startling Developments Follow Finding of Body of Ruth Cruger

READS LIKE FICTION

New York Lady Lawyer Instrumental in Solving The Case

Hundreds of girls disappear in New York City every year; and ninety-nine out of each hundred, according to the official police theory, elope with someone. This engaging theory promises to bring about a convulsion in the New York police force comparable only to the sensation of the Becker murder, arrest and trial. A New York girl disappeared; the police held the notion that she had eloped. The girl's family and a woman lawyer insisted that she had either been lured into the white slave traffic or that she had been murdered. The police smiled. The family and the woman lawyer persisted. Then the police, aggrieved, set some small and tentative obstacles in the path of the family and lawyer. These were removed. The girl's body was discovered in the cellar of the man whom the police supposed to have been her companion in the mysterious flight. The man himself was in Italy. He was arrested, stoutly denying his guilt. Then he confessed that he had murdered the girl. The next night he tried to commit suicide. That was last Sunday night.

The Disappearance of Ruth Cruger.

The story is so remarkable that for a week or so past it has taken precedence of the war in the matter of emphatic headlines in the New York daily newspapers. The victim was Ruth Cruger, a New York girl of some 16 or 17 years. One day last February she left her home with a pair of skates which she wanted sharpened. She went to a general machine and bicycle store kept by Italian named Alfred Cocchi. From the time she entered the shop all trace was lost of her. The police were notified when she failed to come home the following day, and they tracked her to Cocchi's. They even made a perfunctory examination of the premises. No trace of the missing girl was found. Cocchi said that after leaving her skates she had gone out of the shop and he had seen no more of her. The police continued to investigate the case, but in an even more perfunctory manner. The next day Cocchi disappeared, leaving a wife and family behind him. This confirmed the police in their original theory that the girl had eloped. She had eloped with her murderer, of course. What could be clearer?

Mrs. Sherlock Holmes.

The father of the girl, however, insisted that his daughter had not eloped. He clung to the theory that she had been abducted, and he appealed again and again to the police. They soothed him to the best of their ability in view of their theory that she and Cocchi had run away, but he declined to be soothed. The case was brought to the attention of Mrs. Grace Humiston, a New York lawyer, the wife of a lawyer, and a woman who had on two or three previous occasions shown that she possessed considerable gifts as a detective. Also she was a sworn and official enemy of all white slavers. She was interested at once, and surmised that an open-air girl like Ruth Cruger, who loved skating and similar pastimes, was not the kind of girl to elope, especially with a married Italian bicycle repair man. The family, smarting under the implication that Ruth had become infatuated with Cocchi, prevailed upon her to take up the case.

Finding the Body.

She began by making an investigation of Cocchi's reputation, and what she discovered within a few hours convinced her that the man should have been arrested on suspicion as soon as the girl had been traced to his shop. She and her assistant detectives finally discovered a couple of men who had seen Cocchi emerging from the cellar under his shop about midnight on the day that Ruth had vanished. There followed the natural desire to dig up the cellar. Here Mrs. Cocchi intervened and forbade the excavations. An appeal was taken to the Board of Health and permission was granted to dig up under the sidewalk in front of the cellar. In a short time a corset-cover and bag, identified as belonging to the missing girl, were exhumed. At this juncture Mrs. Cocchi moved out of the shop and the new tenants permitted a thorough examination of the cellar. The searchers soon found the body of Ruth, evidently murdered in a particularly brutal way.

Police to Blame.

It was then that the storm burst, through the newspapers, upon the New York Police Department. The reports of the detectives who had been assigned to make the first investigation were produced. It was made plain that the police had acted upon a preconceived theory, and had made no honest attempt to thoroughly examine Cocchi. Letters were found in which the Italian was recommended by members of the force to persons unknown as being "O.K." Other police were shown to have been his friends. Several suits of clothing came to light in the course of the excavation. At least one of them was shown to have been owned by a police official. In the meantime Cocchi was arrested in Italy, and tried to commit suicide after making a confession. He had made advances to the girl, and when repulsed had murdered her. He may have murdered others. His reputation was vile. It must have been known to the police in the district. If not, their imbecility was as culpable as their callousness. At the present time there is an investigation going on which has resulted in the suspension of several officers. The end may bring about a shake-up the like of which has not been seen since the days of the Lexow commission.
