BREEZY SESSION OF THE COMMONS

New Members Ignore Rules of the House and Cause a Humorous Situation.

The Parliamentary manner of some of the new members of the House of Commons may not be quite in accordance with British traditions, but it is at all events expressive, sometimes piquant, and not infrequently amusing. There were two samples of it this afternoon, one of them amusing, the other perhaps not so much so. The House was in supply on the public works estimates, and Hon. Mr. Pugsley was under fire, when Mr. Price (Con.), West Quebec, rose to protest against what he regarded as the extravagance shown in construction of the new military quarters at Kingston. Throughout his speech, which was really a harangue, he addressed the minister of public works as "you," and committed other Parliamentary improprieties which in an older member would have instantly called down upon his head the wrath of the Speaker. In the fervor of his denunciation he characterized the expenditure as "a disgrace," applied a few more epithets, and finally wound up by declaring, with a vicious thump on his desk, that "if you don't stop this sort of thing, by Jove, we will turn you out."

The humor of the situation appealed even to Mr. Price, who joined heartily in the laughter which his virtuous indignation and dire threat expressed in such homely language, created.

Major Currie's Charges.

The other illustration of the novel methods of new blood was furnished by Major Currie (North Simcoe), who in the short time he has been in Parliament has developed an aggressiveness that some of the older parliamentary hands might envy. Having, as it seemed, fallen heir to the microscope which Mr. Ames used so often last session, Major Currie had applied to the pages of the boundaries' treaty concluded with the United States last year, with the result that he has detected the omission of a word. In calling the attention of the House to his discovery he saw fit to emulate the manner and methods of Senator Smith, of Michigan, and indulged in a series of sweeping statements as to treaties with the United States and Japan. Ever since the War of Independence, he declared, Canada had complacently gone on losing territory to the United States, and it seemed to him that in the boundaries treaty the Dominion had again been "goldbricked." In examining the first draft of that treaty as presented to Parliament he had found that the articles referring to the re-demarcation of the boundary adjoining the mouth of Pigeon River and Lake of the Woods followed the wording as in the Ashburton treaty, that "the boundary line shall not intersect the Island." These words also appeared in the second draft, but in the copy of the treaty as printed for circulation he had discovered that the word "not" was omitted.

Fears for Hunter Island.

That meant, he explained, that one of the richest portions of the Province of Ontario, known as Hunter Island, might go to the United States, and he warned the Government that such a concession would create great dissension and trouble between Canada and the United States. Had Major Currie applied his microscope more closely to the printed copy of the treaty, however, he would have found it specifically stated that "the boundary shall be a water line," and this, together with his admission that in the first and second drafts there was the phrase that "the boundary shall not intersect islands," seems to make it clear that the omission upon which he based his tirade against treaties was nothing more than a clerical or typographical error. This view of the case is supported by the declaration of Dr. W. F. King, one of the Canadian representatives of the boundary commission, who stated tonight that Hunter Island was not in question, as the new boundary followed the present line as marked on the maps. There had, he said, been absolutely no cession of territory to the United States, and the treaty simply provided for the remarking of the boundary as delimited by the Ashburton treaty.

Not only, in Major Currie's opinion, had Canada been repeatedly "goldbricked" by the United States, but the Dominion had also suffered as the result of the Japanese treaty, which, he declared, had been too hurriedly concluded.

The Premier's Reply.

No notice having been given by Major Currie that he intended to raise the question, the Prime Minister was unable offhand to give an explanation of the omission of the "not," but he promised to look into the matter. At the same time he felt it necessary to reproach the major for what he described as his unwarranted criticism of the Japanese treaty. That treaty had been to the advantage of Canada, not only in the matter of preserving trade with Japan for Canada, but had, with the supplemental agreement restricting the immigration of the Japanese, met the requirements of the people on the Pacific coast. That agreement was being honorably acted up to by Japan. With regard to the waterways treaty he could only say that he believed it would be found to be fair and reasonable, doing justice to both parties.
