NOTES AND NEWS.

LITERARY.

J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston, are about to publish an interesting novel by Emile Gaborian, entitled "Within an Inch of His Life"—a tale of circumstantial evidence against an innocent man.

Mr. Henry Holt, New York, who, some years since, translated About's "The Man with the Broken Ear," has lately completed a translation of his "Notary's Nose," to be published shortly in the Leisure Hour Series.

General Francis A. Walker, recently Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has nearly ready for publication, through Messrs. Jas. R. Osgood & Co., Boston, a book entitled "The Indian Question," giving the results of his experience and observation.

UNITED STATES.

In the Chicago Police Court last Friday two drunken bummers gave their names respectively as Henry Ward Beecher and Theodore Tilton.

The champion mean man is located in Newport, R. I., again. It is a story of a landlord who lately, wishing to get rid of a sick tenant, threw several pails of water upon the floor of a room above, and allowed it to run through upon the consumptive's bed. Afterward, when the tenant had been removed, he hoisted a flag upon the premises by way of rejoicing and to show his disregard of public opinion. The tenant has since died.

They have an emphatic way of courting among the hills of Missouri. A widow named Ruth Rush, who lives on the Upper Tygart, in Carter county, has a pretty daughter. Shelton Ham was at the house on a recent evening courting the daughter, when another lover, Thos. Pollard, arrived. The widow not liking Pollard, barred him out. Pollard threatened to break the door down, and swore that he would kill Ham. The widow went out at the back of the house and summoned a party of neighbors. They found Pollard battering the door and shot him. Then some friends of Pollard fired from the bushes, fortunately hitting nobody.

The Supreme Court of Maine has just rendered a somewhat important decision relating to the liability of telegraph companies for errors in the transmission of despatches. Some four years ago a business firm in that State telegraphed to a firm in Chicago by the Western Union line for ten thousand bushels of corn, but the despatch was made to read "one thousand," and before the error could be corrected corn rose and the firm lost nine hundred dollars. It was a night message, and the usual agreement that the telegraph company shall not be liable for blunders was signed, but the Court decided that such a contract, being against public policy, is void, and therefore awarded the amount claimed.

A wonderful story of disinterestedness comes from down east to the effect that, as a young lady was going aboard of a steamer at Portland on Wednesday last she lost a gold locket from her neck and it fell into the water. A young man, who was standing near and saw the accident, took off his coat and dived for the locket, and though he did not succeed in getting it at first, persisted in his endeavors until he found the jewel. The girl's father offered the fellow a handsome reward, but he refused it. Only think of a young man taking all that trouble merely to save a lock of some other young fellow's hair for a girl to gush over.

GENERAL.

John Wesley was never low spirited or fretful, and could not endure the society of people who were so. "I dare no more fret," said he, "than to curse and swear."

Dr. Janizewski of the Roman Catholic Church, Suffragan Bishop of Posen, has been arrested for violation of the ecclesiastical laws, and condemned to 15 months' imprisonment.

Here is a recipe for getting up a fashionable summer bonnet: Let the lady run her head into a sheaf of oats, and afterwards stick in a few field flowers here and there to light up her coiffure, and the thing is done.

Anselm Rothschild, a member of the Austrian branch of the Rothschild family died on Monday in Vienna. He was a descendant of Meyer Anselm Rothschild, five of whose sons settled in different cities of Europe and amassed great wealth.

The statement which recently appeared as to a gross outrage alleged to have been perpetrated upon a woman near Skead's Mills, on the Ottawa River, appears to have been a hoax perpetrated by a reporter addicted to depraved sensationalism.

The Canadian Government purposes making a treaty this Summer with the Plain Cree Indians, living between Fort Ellice and the south branch of the Saskatchewan, with a view to inducing the Indians to go to a distant reservation. This will open for settlement a tract five times as large as Manitoba, and equally fertile and richer in other resources.

Information has been received at the Treasury Department at Washington, that a quarantine of 15 full days has been ordered at Malta upon all vessels arriving there from the Provinces of Tripoli, Barbary, owing to the appearance of a malignant type of spotted fever at Bengkaz. The disease is described as very violent and fatal in form.

A priest at Santa Marta, in the United States of Columbia, followed Father Hyacinthe's example, and took to himself a wife. He has lately repented, and addressed a petition to the Bishop of Dibona, begging the pardon of the Church, and declaring that he has put away the woman. The pardon has been granted.

Two cases of heavy play, a London correspondent states, are now being talked of in West End circles. At one of the best Pall Mall clubs the other evening, a foreign Prince, who resides chiefly in England, took £4,000 at ecarte from a young gentleman whose conduct is not at all excused by the fact that he will have considerable difficulty in paying the money, if he ever pays it all. At another club, further west, a certain gallant captain renowned for his astuteness on the turf, was clever enough to lose £2,000 to a well-known baronet at hazard, but in this case a check was handed over on the spot.

Galileo's Fall.

The close of the 16th century and the triumphs of the Jesuits gave the final blow to the vigor of the Italian mind. From that inauspicious moment, save one, no powerful and independent thinker, no Milton, Bacon, Newton, Hampden, flourished on the sterile scene of priestly tyranny. For two centuries the voice of free discussion was stilled, the wants and aspirations of the people found no utterance nor defender, or if one ventured to sigh for a new Italy he was shut up in the cells of the Roman Inquisition or banished to the chill regions of the North. The deliverance of Italy from its mental bondage and its spiritual foes has come at last from foreign hands and hostile arms, and the perpetuation of its novel freedom must rest in no slight degree upon the protection of a German lord. Yet it was to Italy that Europe once looked for its own deliverance from feudal tyranny and mental decay. Its prosperous republics, the centres of industry, taught to Germany and England the chief elements of civilization; the poets of Tuscany awakened the European intellect. But for Dante and Petrarch there could have been no Shakspeare nor Spenser; and when in its last decline, in the close of the 16th century, the poison of priestly tyranny had dissolved all its members, when there was no room for letters and no hope of mental advance, the genius of Italy had already clothed itself in the guise of painters and sculptors, and covered with a cloud of artistic glory a land that was swiftly perishing in the deadly embrace of Popes and Kings.

The trial and imprisonment of Galileo form the final scene in the death of the Italian intellect. The most eminent genius of his country, if not of his age, almost the founder of modern science, the peer and contemporary of Shakspeare, Bacon, Milton, the successor of Michael Angelo, had Galileo obtained an utterance in Italy for scientific truth, the spell that rested upon her might have been broken. There might have bloomed once more a literature touched by the free spirit of Dante, a political progress that would have effected the Puritanical revolutions of the North. But with Galileo fell the independence of Italian thought. His abjuration is the saddest picture in modern intellectual history. Conscious of the truth, he was condemned to renounce it and repeat a falsehood. The Newton, the Herschell of his age, he was forced to abjure the favorite studies of his life, and pause forever in that path of scientific discovery which had already made Italy famous. All the world witnessed his fall, and he whose eye had first pierced the mysterious vault above, who of all his race had first brought tidings of new suns and planets in its sublime abyss, yielded to the terrors of torture, the fear of death, and sacrificed the integrity of his soul to the menaces of the church. With malignant joy the Jesuits saw the last great Italian perish within their toils, and were perhaps satisfied with the humiliation of Galileo.

When, at the close of his splendid career, covered with renown, yet shut up in his villa at Arcetri, the prisoner of the Inquisition, watched by envious eyes, threatened, should he murmur or rebel, with the most dreadful punishments of the church, Galileo, sick and worn with age and sorrow, lamented in letters to his friends that he had ever ventured upon those fatal studies which had served only to bring upon him persecution and shame, a fair-haired, blue-eyed poet from the cloudy North, who was just entering with an equal ardor upon the search for truth, visited the bright skies of Florence, saw with astonishment the imprisonment of its greatest genius, and heard, perhaps, from his own lips the unmerited sorrows that had fallen upon his later years. It was Milton lamenting for Galileo. In the cultivated society of Florence the young English scholar must often have remembered the lonely prisoner who, shut out from all the pleasures of intellectual intercourse, was confined in the distant villa. Milton at Florence wrote verses, was complimented in graceful stanzas, and was not slow to return the elegant adulation. Yet with all the more intelligent Florentines he saw typified in the fate of Galileo the quick extinction of Italian letters. In his defense of the freedom of the press, he relates to the English public how a severe Inquisition had checked at Florence all mental progress, how the accomplished Florentines lamented that they had not been born in a land like England, where learning was free, how nothing was now written in Italy but "flattery and fustian." "There," he adds, "it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo grown old, a prisoner to the Inquisition." The spectacle of the great philosopher, silenced, terrified, contemned, never passed from his mind. In his youth he had lamented over him tenderly. In manhood, when a mental tyranny like that which hung over Italy seemed about to envelop all England, and a persecuting church and a despotic king had nearly subdued its virtue, Milton, instructed by the fate of Italian thought, led on the defenders of freedom. And when, in his old age, blind and forsaken like Galileo, he poured forth in sonorous strains the treasures of a life of study, one of his most splendid similes, one of his most touching allusions, is when he paints the Tuscan artist on the height of Fiesole, and makes the chief glory of science lend aid to the immortal grandeur of his song.—Eugene Lawrence in Harper's Magazine for August.

Hanging for Horse Stealing.

We do not consider hanging at all a fit penalty for horse-stealing, even when the punishment is inflicted according to law. We regard lynching of all descriptions as extremely undesirable. Hanging a boy eighteen years of age for any crime is, prima facie, a barbarous business. The St. Joseph (Mo.) Herald describes the murder of James Ross, who had been arrested for making free with the steeds of the farmers in that vicinity. Ross, in the custody of an officer, was on his way to jail, when he was seized, in spite of the constable's remonstrances, by a mob of armed men. Resistance was useless. Ross was dragged from his horse and taken into "the timber." Then, for the first time, this boy seemed to comprehend the awful fate which awaited him. He shook with fear and cried for mercy. With one end of the rope about his neck he burst into tears; he admitted that he had stolen horses; but then he added piteously that "he was a mere boy, and wanted time to reform." The only answer to this was the stern warning that he "had but five minutes left"; and four stout men significantly took hold of the rope. The lad was so agitated that he would have fallen to the ground if he had not been supported. Then he rallied again, and again he sought mercy. He might as well have spoken to the dead. Then came "silence for a moment," broken only by the tick of the watch in the spokesman's hand. There was no pity in their rigid faces. The shadows of night were gathering, and only a minute remained to him, when the boy began to pray, although in a tone so low that his words were indistinguishable. Then came from the executioner the cry of "Time's up;" and after the single exclamation, "O, my God!" the body of the young horse-thief was dangling 10 feet from the ground. His hands were thrown wildly up to catch the rope, but a moment after they dropped lifeless on each side, and the boy horse-thief was dead. The executioners mounted their horses and rode rapidly away, leaving the corpse there alone with the night.

It is curious to notice how, under these wild frontier conditions, the law is upon the one hand contemptuously disregarded, and upon the other studiously respected. After the lynchers had departed the Coroner came. He tenderly cut down the boy's body and proceeded to hold an inquest. The only witness examined was the bereaved constable, who swore in the most satisfactory way that the lad had been taken from him. The death proved itself, and the jury found that the deceased died by violence "at the hands of some party or parties unknown." This was deemed quite enough by every horse owner in the country. Their equine losses had been avenged, and why should they too curiously seek for the avengers, especially when such a search might have been personally inconvenient to some of them? There was one horse thief less in Holt County. So they thanked God, took courage, and kept perfectly quiet.
