Poetry.

"THE WIND PASSETH OVER IT, AND IT IS GONE."

Unnumber'd flowers, fresh gay and bright,
A morning gorgeous robe spring;
The light wind breathes a sudden blight,
And all that form lies withering,
Now zephyrs sigh unscented o'er
The place where beauty blooms no more.

Unnumber'd wild, softest blue-bells opens
Great young summer's glad return
A few days of these bright hopes
Where [illegible] are born
Each [illegible] gently falls o'er,
And [illegible] no more.

And [illegible] human life [illegible]
And destiny [illegible] flower
Which blooms so [illegible] the vale.
And vanishes in one [illegible]
No [illegible] may [illegible] —
[illegible] morning breaks [illegible] bud.

Though strong seems manhood's manly frame,
Though bright the woman's love lit eye,
Resistless Death will urge his claim,
And strength will fail and beauty fly;
Life's flowers by an unseen hand
Are gathered, for the spirit land.

But far beyond the shores of time,
Beyond Death's cold and gloomy vale,
There is a bright, unchanging clime,
Where Death never flies upon the gale:
There life's pure waters ever flow—
There flowers immortal ever blow.

Oh, if our wayward wandering feet
Are turned toward that bright abode:
And if our hearts are temples meet
For indwelling of our God,
Then oh ye blighting winds of time,
And wait ye to that future clime.

VARIETY.

POCAHONTAS IN LONDON.—As soon as Capt. Smith heard of her being established, he hastened to welcome her, taking with him a party of his friends. It is undoubtedly true, through not state of Smith's account of the interview, that he met her with the ceremonious deference and reserve appropriate to the character in which she appeared, and to the sphere in which she was then moving, but in strong contrast to the frank and easy cordiality which had marked their interviews in the wilderness. This she instantly perceived. It keenly wounded her sensitive nature. Her heart had bound leal toward the man whom she had ever regarded with child-like reverence and trust. But formality in him! she had not dreamed of it. It was chilling, cutting, stunning; for she had lost none of the simplicity, none of the affectionateness, none of the sensitiveness, which had marked her elastic childhood. The open warmth of the rough soldier had always gladdened her: the [illegible] ness of the precise visitor smote upon her heart. She could not grapple to it. She returned it by a passionless and silent salutation, turned directly about and covered her face with her hands. From this grieved and worldliness humanity she would not be disturbed, so that Rolfe and the visitors left her, which to the mortification of Smith. After two or three hours they returned, when she began to talk.

"I was no other than you made to be. I was but a little girl, yet I could save your life and the lives of your people whenever I could. Enough I did not know God then, he moved my heart to love you and your people, and to take care of you. I saw you ready to smile, and put your hand on my head, and look in my eyes, and say, 'Good Lord, my child!' But now, where there are no Powhatans to hurt you, look no smile, you say no word to God, you make one stiff step over, and say, 'Lady Re-becca!' and a sneer of contempt could be seen upon her quivering lip as she pronounced her new name. 'I see you have forgotten Pocahontas. You came to see the Lady Rebecca. She was here then,'—pleading to her own coldness and silence,—'but she is gone now. This is Pocahontas, Captain Smith,—your child.'"

A good story of Gibbon is told in the last volume of Moore's Memoirs. The dramatis personæ were Lady Elizabeth Foster, Gibbon, the Historian, and an eminent French physician, the Historian and doctor being rivals in courting the lady's favor. Impatient at Gibbon's occupying so much of her attention by his conversation, the doctor said crossly to him, "When my Lady Elizabeth Foster is made ill by your twaddle, I will cure her." On which Gibbon, drawing himself up gravely, looking disdainfully at the physician, replied, "When my Lady Elizabeth Foster is dead from your recipes, I will immortalize her.

THE STARS.—These stars says something very significant to all of us, and each man has the whole hemisphere of them, if he will look up to counsel and befriend him. In the evening they appear to us to chasten our personal thoughts; to put down what is exhorbitant in earth-bred fancies, and to encourage those endeavours and aspirations which meet with no full response from any single planet—certainly not from the one we are on—but which derive their meaning and their end from the vastness and harmony of the whole of God-directed nature and life.

TO THE GIRLS.—A young lady has no moral right to discharge a betrothed lover merely because she has met a gentleman who she prefers to him; this is playing fast and loose rather freely. Fickle man's inconstancy after this! She would be served right for her fickleness if she lost him.

Remember that an impious or profane thought uttered by a parent's lips, may operate on the young heart like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust which no after cleaning can efface.

The largest angel we ever read of was seen by Bethomet in the third heaven, which the Koran says is two eyes seventy thousand days journey apart.

"There are some members of a community," said the witty Thomas Bradbury, "that are like a crumb on the throat: if they go the right way they afford little nourishment, but if they happen to go the wrong way, they give a great deal of trouble."

Caution to the Public.

I BEG leave to notify my friends and customers that on the first day of May I removed one door above my old stand in the same building, and since that period parties who leased the premises formerly occupied by me, have without a parallel of right put up the sign of "GRANITE HALL," the name that I have done business under for the last seven years; and taken other means to lead strangers and others to believe that it was the same establishment as heretofore.

In justice to the public I now distinctly state that I have no communication with the place whatever, that my place of business is one door above, in the store formerly occupied by William McGinley, where I hope to give as good satisfaction to the public as I have formerly.
