The Rose of Wentworth

She thought it strange that he should absent himself thus, but supposed that Lady Hamilton had sent him on some commission, and never once suspected that he was at that moment in his own room, prone upon his bed, battling with all his might against the misery that was mastering him, and the doom which he believed had been pronounced upon his hopes.

He felt as if he could never look upon his first love again and bear the pain of it—could never meet the man who had betrayed his confidence, and won the only woman he could ever love.

When, the next morning, he joined the family at breakfast, his face was white and sunken, his eyes heavy and dull, his manner unnatural and constrained, and he started violently whenever anyone spoke; for he was in constant fear of hearing an engagement announced.

Lady Hamilton was alarmed and declared he was sick, and was for sending for a doctor at once.

He said he was not ill, though he confessed he had not slept well, but affirmed that he should be all right again soon.

He pleaded a headache as an excuse for not joining a party upon an excursion which had been planned for that day to visit some splendid springs, about five miles distant, and then felt as if he should go crazy listening to the regrets that poured upon him from all quarters.

Lady Elaine said nothing; but she looked troubled and anxious.

He had not once met her eye—had not spoken one word to her, beyond a brief "good morning," and she was quite sure that something very serious was the matter, both physically and mentally, and she was quietly resolved to learn the nature of it before the day was ended.

Quite a large party was to visit the springs, many of the neighboring families having been invited to "picnic" with the Hamiltons, and when at length the gay company cantered down the avenue, their happy voices and laughter dying away in the distance, Wil Hamilton, in his room, with the curtains and blinds drawn close—for he could not even bear the light of the glad, bright day—heaved a sigh of relief at their departure.

"They are gone," he said. "Now I will go where nobody can come near me—where nobody can see me."

Rising hastily, he caught up his hat, crushed it down over his eyes, and stealing down a side stairway, he went out, and with a quick, fierce stride, he walked across the lawn toward the forest beyond, where he was soon lost to sight.

An hour later a slight, graceful figure, clad in a dress of crisp, delicate lavender lawn, made in the daintiest manner, a charming shade-hat of white chip, lined with blue, upon her golden head, and a pretty basket hanging on her arm, might have been seen flitting down the avenue, as if intent upon a solitary ramble.

Arriving at the gate, Lady Elaine—for, of course, it was she—stopped and looked right and left, as is somewhat in doubt what direction to take.

She finally decided upon turning to the left, moving with a free, brisk step, and all unconscious that she was walking straight to meet her fate, for the forest lay off in that direction.

As soon as Wil had announced his intention of remaining at home, she mentally resolved that she would not accompany the party, either. It would not be pleasant to be in the presence of Mr. Paxton after what had occurred the previous evening, while she judged from his last words before leaving her, and his manner, that he did not take the refusal as final, and intended to prosecute his attentions still further.

It was with a feeling of relief that she, too, heard the gay party cantering down the avenue, and knew that she should have the day to dispose of at her own sweet will.

A sense of freedom and something of exhilaration seemed to possess her as she found herself walking alone along the highway, beneath the friendly shade of the huge, overhanging elms.

After walking a short distance, she turned into a cart-path leading into the woods, where she roamed about for an hour or more, filling her pretty basket with sylvan treasures, then, feeling somewhat weary and warm, she resolved to make her way to a tiny brook, where there was a rustic seat, and where she and Annie often came with their books and work to spend a warm afternoon.

Softly and almost as light-footed as a fairy she glided down the mossy way, and ere long reached the spot. Parting a thick growth of foliage, she stepped instantly into a small, open space, and the next instant started back suddenly with a smothered cry of terror, for there, prone upon the earth before her, was the stretched form of a man, his face to the ground.

He did not move, he scarcely seemed to breathe, and for a moment she stood irresolute whether to fly or go to his aid.

Then, as her quick eye marked and recognized the clothing, she became as pale as death with a sudden fear.

It was Wil Hamilton, and so wretched and absorbed as he was in his sorrow, he had not been conscious of the approach of anyone, and lay as motionless as if he were dead.

Lady Elaine's first thought was that he had met with some accident and was unconscious.

But with all her delicacy and gentle breeding she was brave at heart, and possessed a latent energy and force which few gave her credit for.

Lightly and as fleet as a deer she sped over the turf, and knelt beside the prostrate man, sweeping back the moist brown locks from his forehead as she did so.

"Wil, Wil — oh, is anything the matter? Are you hurt?" she cried, her voice shaking with the great fear that had taken possession of her.

In an instant he had sprung to his feet, and stood looking down upon her, as if he thought her some thunderbolt, which had just missed striking him dead; while she, startled by the suddenness of his act, sat staring up at him, every atom of strength and color forsaking her.

"I thought you had gone to the springs," Wil said, abruptly, almost rudely, after a moment.

His voice was harsh and constrained, his face as white as her own, with great deep circles beneath his eyes, which were bloodshot, and were so full of pain that Lady Elaine almost cried out as she looked at them.

"No, I—I did not care to go," she returned, struggling to her feet, and shrinking slightly from him.

She felt as if she had no right to be there—as if she had intruded upon him and his grief, whatever it might be. She would have given worlds to have been anywhere else at that moment.

He looked at her curiously.

"She did not care to go!" he thought, wonderingly.

But Philip had gone with the rest,
