FAR FLUNG IS THE ARMY WORK

Wonderful Figures of the Salvation Forces

OAK FROM THE ACORN

A Peep Into International Headquarters in London Where General Booth Held Reins of Government—The Matter of Cost

(London Daily Telegraph.)

When William Booth started his lifework, in 1868, at Whitechapel, he did so with no settled plan, and with very little knowledge of the problems he was going to attack. He had no intention of forming a new religious society, and even his fervent and fertile mind never conceived the growth of an immense organization such as he controlled to the last.

The international headquarters of the Salvation Army are in Queen Victoria street, E. C., and occupy a great block of buildings, such as might be tenanted by a large commercial firm. Externally the structure is common-place and unimpressive, but internally it differs considerably from the usual city offices. The hundreds of men and women in the uniform of the army, the lack of concessions to ornament or comfort, seem to place it on a different plane.

The headquarters are a perfect maze. There are offices innumerable, small, and furnished with the barest necessities; many stairs and tortuous passages and little hole-and-corner places, for every inch of space has been utilized, and it requires long acquaintance to obtain a working knowledge of its topography. At the end of a dark passage are two rooms enclosed by double doors, and these are the only ones that seem at all private, and secluded. One was used by the late general and the other is where Bramwell Booth does his work. Both are simply furnished.

Round about this quiet backwater ebbs and flows the restless tide of activity, the hum and bustle, and the coming and going, and the hurry of work of the hive of industry that one great man controlled.

Thousand Letters a Day

System and organization are necessities for the proper control of this great army, whose ramifications extend all over the world. A thousand letters are received at headquarters every day, and this correspondence covers a range of multitudinous affairs and emanates from people of every rank and station in life and many nationalities:

The following figures show the extent of Salvation Army work at the end of 1911:—

Countries and colonies occupied	58
Languages in which the work is conducted	34
Corps, circles, and societies	9,040
Officers and cadets (including social)	15,945
Persons without rank wholly employed in Salvation Army work	5,153
Local officers (spare-time, but unpaid)	52,794
Bandsmen	25,416
Songsters	9,369
Periodicals:—
(a) Number	81
(b) In languages	25
(c) Total copies per issue	1,136,337
Open-air meetings (weekly)	32,000
Social operations:—
Institutions and branches	1,025
Officers and cadets employed in social work	2,637
Beds supplied (12 months)	6,597,803
Meals supplied (12 months)	12,207,642

With such a colossal undertaking as this it is small wonder that a staff of 300 men and women is required at headquarters.

Here are a few of the philanthropic institutions connected with the army:—

Rescue Homes	115
Maternity homes	22
Children's homes	39
Slum posts	149
Prison-gate homes	17
Shelters and cheap food depots	240
Workshops and factories	172
Labor bureaux	60
Farms	18

The Army Abroad

Branches of the Salvation Army are to be found in the following countries:—

France, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Denmark, Iceland, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Italy, Gibraltar, Malta, Austria, B. India, Java, Sumatra, Celebes, China, Korea, Japan, Ceylon, Cape Colony, Natal, Transvaal, Orange Free State, Basutoland, Zululand, Bechunaland, Swaiziland, Mashonaland, Rhodesia, Mexico, Argentine, Uruguay, Paraguay, Chili, Peru, Panama, Barbadoes, B. Guinea, Cuba, Jamaica, Antigua, Trinidad, Canada, Newfoundland, British Columbia, United States, P. E. Island, S. Australia, W. Australia, Victoria, Queensland, N. S. Wales, New Zealand, Tasmania.

The extension of the Salvation Army to lands beyond the seas has to a large extent been due to individual effort, not directed, at the outset, from headquarters. The work in the United States, for example, began in 1881, through the efforts of a silk worker, who had come under the influence of the army at Coventry. In the same way, the foundations of the organization in Australia were laid by a milk dealer, who had emigrated from Stepney. In other than English-speaking countries the work of the army is enormously assisted by interpreters, and a corps of specialists has been developed, so that in whatever part of the globe an English-speaking Salvation Army officer appears, there he will find a duly appointed and capable translater to interpret his thoughts and words.

The reports of work done received by the foreign secretary are remarkable records of labor and effort, and they come from many unpromising lands. In Korea, for example, forty-five corps and outposts have been opened, and the majority of the sixty-one officers and cadets are Koreans.

In India the army is strongly established, as the following figures show:—

European and American misisonaries	190
Native officers, cadets, and employes	2,445
Corps and outposts	2,574
Languages spoken	12
Social institutions	81
Persons cared for in same	3,989

What it Costs

The expenditure on the work of the army is necessarily very large, and the following are some of the principal items of expenditure in 1911, apart from social work, for which £53,000 is required annually:—

Training of officers	£20,000
Sick and wounded fund and homes of rest for officers	6,000
Maintenance of work in India	25,000
Maintenance of work in Japan Korea, Java, and evangelization of native races in Africa and West Indies	15,000
For the work in France, Italy, South America, and other Catholic countries	8,000
Foreign service fund	9,000
General maintenance and assistance	20,000
Pension fund for disabled officers	2,000
Work amongst soldiers and sailors	2,000

BRITISH EMPIRE 100 YEARS HENCE

What London Writer Sees In The Future

THE COMPONENT PARTS

Possibility of Centre of Empire Being Transported Across The Atlantic — An Opinion About the Dominions—Commercial and Military

(G. H. L. in London Standard.)

In these high tension days we are most of us too busily engaged in making a living and adjusting the mechanism of government to our immediate needs to have much opportunity for philosophic speculation as to events of the future—even though they may fall within the compass of our individual spans of life. It is unfortunate that this is so, since any tendency towards a narrowing of perspective is bound to diminish the effectiveness of our statesmen in direct ratio to the amount by which their horizons are contracted. So it is advisable once in a while, even at the risk of achieving the reputation of being thoroughly unpractical persons, that we should indulge that faculty, absent in the vast majority of mankind, in its present stage of evolution, dormant in many more, and active in comparatively few, of projecting ourselves into the future and endeavoring to construct a mental picture of the political aspect of our planet, say, a hundred years ahead.

What will be the standing of the British Empire in A. D. 2013? Though the answer must be subject to the usual reservations which apply to all prophesies, it is possible dimly to glimpse an outline of the future destinies of our race. First, it must be pointed out that never before in the known history of the world has there been a political organism comparable to that of the Britains today. The earlier empires have been military in their inception, military in their maintenance, and their decline and fall was brought about by the decay of the military power of the central nucleus which exerted dominance over a number of conquered but not assimilated territories.

The British Empire resembles these military growths of the past only in the respect that it was largely won by the sword of its parent state. But it does not depend altogether today, in so far as the white man's countries are concerned, upon the legions of that parent for its defence, and the time is undoubtedly not far distant when each of the self-governing portions will do its full proportionate share in the defence of the whole organism. Consequently, from a military point of view the empire of 2013 will most probably consist of a congeries of allied autonomous states under a common head. They will have a federal council which, without possessing the power to interfere in the domestic affairs of any unit, will control the exterior policy of the whole, and fix the quota of ships and men which each must provide for their united defence. One may hope that the United States will be one of the units of this world group. Canada by that time will probably have a population of close on 100,000,000, and it is quite possible that the federal capital of the Anglo-Saxon Federation will be situated upon the international border between Canada and the United States.

Shoul this happen, the era of universal peace would not seem so distant as it does today, for if all these countries were loosely knit into a vast commercial empire the military powers of central and northern Europe would be so completely overshadowed that they would agree to abandon the mad competition in armaments which they are provoking in these troublous times. It would seem to be the highest mission of the Anglo-Saxon race to bestow the priceless blessing of a universal "Pax Britannica" upon this war-scarred world.

Dealing individually with the component parts of the existing British Empire, there are four which do not seem to have any really serious problems to surmount. Canada's racial difficulty is almost dead, Newfoundland, Australia, and New Zealand are in the happy position of having nothing to worry about except development. South and East Africa are on a different footing. The Dutch and English racial problem is transient—a hundred years hence it will have been forgotten. But the relationship of the white and black races is a thorny question indeed, and I do not intend to venture on prophecy here. This is a matter which must be left to time. "Solvitur Ambulando."

As regards India, here again it would be rash to say overmuch. Some day we may elect to leave India to govern itself, though that day is far off yet. Whether it will be in sight in A. D. 2013 or whether by that time India will be a self-governing entity within the imperial ring, I will not commit myself to predict. As for West Africa, the other large non-white portion of our domain, the probabilities are that it will be in much the same condition a hundred years hence as India is today so far as governance is concerned.

Lastly, there are these islands, the cradle of our race. What is to be their destiny in the century to come? The most clearly indicated probability that stands out is that there will be a slow but steady decline of population, beginning about 1950. The outward flow of people to the Dominions and the declining birthrate must eventually produce its effect. Nor is it necessarily the misfortune that some people profess to believe it, that such tendencies exist, in the light of that wider knowledge which a forward glance at the world's history alone can give.

It must be remembered that the coal and iron deposits of these islands, upon which our greatest industries depend, will not last for more than another two or three centuries, in the estimation of those competent to judge. When these natural resources are exhausted there will not be work for nearly as many people as there is at present. So that the outward movement to countries with infinitely larger supplies of the basic materials of industry is not altogether a matter for regret. The United Kingdom must eventually become an agricultural country again, since it can hardly prove profitable to import coal and iron in order to continue the industrial life of the country. It may be that sun-power or tide-power will be utilised by then, but even so, sunlight is none too plentiful in these latitudes, and we are not blessed with an abundance of water-power awaiting harnessing.

Of one thing we may be certain. Even if the centre of the empire shifts across the Atlantic, the love and veneration of the entire race for its original home must preserve it inviolate from alien hands, and its monuments and antiquities will form the objective of thousands of over-sea pilgrims, who will look with pride upon the handiwork of their forefathers, to whom they owe their lands, their liberties, and their proud position among the peoples of the earth.

EXPRESS WAR IS ON IN CANADA

Montreal, Feb. 3—The decision of the government to allow the Dominion Express Company a subsidiary corporation of the C. P. R. to share the express business of the I. C. R., will not be allowed to come into effect without a struggle on the part of the Canadian Express Company. Saturday was the first day of the dual participation in the business, and when the employes of the Dominion concern turned up with their trucks at the Bonaventure station, the Montreal terminal of the Grand Trunk, which is used by the I. C. R., they were met by Grand Trunk men and warned that they had no right to use their premises.

As the Intercolonial has no terminal of its own here, and if the Canadian Pacific can make no arrangement with the Grand Trunk for the use of their premises for the collection of parcels, it looks as if the concession granted by the government will be of little value to it.

PETITCODIAC BOY MISSING

Petitcodiac, N. B., Jan. 31—The village has a mystery in the disappearance of Charles Carter, who left his home on Wednesday, Jan. 22. He left home shortly after supper wearing a light grey suit and red hockey cap. It was at first supposed he had gone to some of his relatives, but no trace of him can be found, and it has become a mystery what has happened to him. He had no money with him and it is feared he has met with some accident.

He is of fair size, fifteen years old; with brown hair and brown eyes, and part of first finger on right hand missing.

Should any one know anything regarding this boy it will clear up a case that is puzzling the people of the village.
