It is a remarkable fact in criminal statistics that no fat man was ever convicted of the crime of murder. Stout people are not resentful; nor, as a general rule, are they agitated by gusts of passion. Few murderers weigh more than ten stone. There are, however, exceptions which justify us in assuming cleanness as the utmost limit of the sliding-scale, but beyond that there is no impulse towards homicide. Seldom has such a phenomenon as a fat housebreaker been paraded at a criminal bar. It is your lean, wiry fellow who works with the skeleton-keys, forces himself through closet-windows which seemingly would scarce admit for the entrance of the necessary cat, steals with noiseless step along the lobby and up the stairs, glides into the chamber sacred for more than half a century to the chaste repose of the gentle Tabitha, and with husky voice, and the exhibition of an enormous carving knife, commands silence on pain of instant death and delivery of her cash and jewels. It is your attenuated thief who insinuates himself under beds, skulks behind counters, dives into tills, or makes prey of articles of commerce arrayed at shop doors for the temptation of the credulous passenger. A corpulent burglar is as much out of place and as little to be feared as was Falstaff at Gadshill—and what policeman never got a chase to a depredator as bulky as a bullock? Corpulence, we maintain, is the outward sign not only of a good constitution, but of inward rectitude and virtue.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Adulterated Candies—Injurious Confections.

Consumers of candies are not aware, altho' it is time they should be, that in some cities, confectioners great and small, have entered largely into the adulteration of what at one time were saccharine preparations, but which are now made part of deleterious earthly substances. We do not know how far the confectioners of this part of the country are dealing out these vile preparations, but it has leaked out that in many places confectioners use extensively as a substitute for sugar, a chalky substance which is known under the name of "terre alba." Its cost to the manufacturer is about one cent and a half per pound, and is generally used in what confectioners technically call "pan work"—such as almonds, sugar-plums and caraways. In many instances it will be found, on examination, that at least two thirds of these confections are composed of this earth, one-third only being sugar, which is put on the outside to make them appear as genuine. The chalk is also introduced extensively into what is called rolled or poured candy; and it will be found in "cave satin lozenges." Taken into the stomach this chalk is impervious to the gastric fluid, and its presence generally results in inflammation of the mucous membrane, acute pain, and ending in the development of disease which may produce death. Adulterated candies can be detected in a very simple manner. Take a wine glass or a tumbler and half fill it with pure water. Drop into the water a suspected confection. It will dissolve in a few minutes. Should it be adulterated, there will be found at the bottom of the glass a heavy white substance. This is the chalk which is all but indissoluble.
