ONLY A FLIRT.

'It's a shame,' says Mrs. Matthews, decidedly.

'She's the most accomplished flirt in Europe! I did not think Stewart Eustace would give her a lesson, but she is going to make a fool of him, too, I—'

'So sorry to disturb you, Mrs Matthews,' says a pleasant, rather lazy voice which has a very startling effect on the lady who springs aside, flushing through all her war-paint.

Mr. Eustace bows with a placid smile as he passes, and slowly winds his way among the various groups to the sofa directly opposite the entrance.

She is looking rather bored and tired he thinks, as she is talking to two or three men, but her face lights brilliantly as her eyes meet his.

'The most accomplished flirt in Europe,' he says to himself with a little thrill, half doubt, half delight, as he takes the slim hand put out to him and looks down at her smiling.

'Your are late. It has been all I could do to keep mamma; but I had promised—'

'To be here when I came. I wonder if I ought to feel very grateful?'

'Really? Well perhaps I don't deserve anything more civil for being so silly as to confess that my promise to you kept me.'

'I am grateful—more so, perhaps, than you ever were for anything in your life. But should I be so if I could read your heart as you read mine?'

The other man had slipped off at his coming, in that way which says so very plainly, 'Behold the master!'

There is no one to overhear the low-spoken words, or the falter in his voice. But she rises in a rather hasty manner.

'Don't let us talk of hearts here.'

'Where then?

'I should say nowhere. One is so much more comfortable when they are left of the question,' she says lightly.

But she dosen't look at him, and he is sure that the faint color is deepening under his gaze.

'Why will you say things you don't mean?' he begins; then breaks off: 'Sit down just five minutes. Remember your promise.'

'Have you made up your mind to be grateful?' she laughs. 'Because it is too late, I'm going. Be good, and take me to mamma in the next romm.'

He gives her his arm; they find Mrs. Van Eyck and make their slow progress to the cloak-room, in perfect silence on his side, though she is more talkative than usual; but as he puts her cloak over her shoulders, he whispers,—

'You will let me see you to-morrow after lunch, won't you?

"If my lord pleases," she says, with a meek little courtesy, "I had rather not.

'Why, what is the matter with you to-night?' he asks, as they go down stairs behind Mrs. Van Eyck and her escort bending his head until his eyes are on a level with hers. 'You know you will let me come—you must!'

'Must I?' her eyes sink in a way unusual to them and the mocking voice is not quite steady. 'Then, if I haven't a headache, and you haven't forgotten, I will see you about four o'clock.'

'And you will think of me a little?'

'Not a bit—if I can help myself; the last is just a breath, as she takes her hand from his arm and follows her mother into the carriage, and they whirl away in the darkness.

'Not coming back mon cher?' asks the fat old marquis, who has been favoring Mrs. Van Eyck with the hundredth edition of some very pointed compliments.

'Thanks, no. As you see, I brought my overcoat down with me,' and lighting a cigarette as he speaks, he turns away.

To-morrow at four o'clock, if she hasn't a headache and he hasn't forgotten—forgotten! He has known her three months, and they have seen a great deal of each other and have played at sentiment and cynicism and other edgedtools from the first, and now it has come to this, that he, Stuart Eustace, past thirty, is more utterly in love than he ever was before, even in his college days. Then he blesses her for it, standing still in the moonlight and letting his cigarette die out unheeded. What a new interest life will have! How much dearer and fairer in even its most commonplace places if she loves him!

Then he sighs quickly and throws his cigarette impatiently away, as he walks on. If she loves him? The most accomplished flirt in Europe!

'Confound that old cat!' he mutters unjustly; for it is his own doubts trouble him, not Mrs. Mathew's words.

She likes him—he can trust his judgment for that much—and she must love him more and more when everything that wealth and devotion can give are hers.

He wonders—he sneers at himself for a faithless fool; but still he wonders whether he should have dared to ask for that interview to-morrow if his love were all he could offer her?'

In the meantime the Van Eycks have reached home. Bertie has kissed her mother 'good night,' and is sitting before the small helpless Italian fire in her bedroom. To-morrow at four o'clock he is coming, and she is going to swear that she loves him and promise to be his wife.

She has many faults, and all her life has declared that luxury and admiration are the gods of her idolatry; but, with all this, she has always known that a loveless marriage would be utterly impossible for her.

People call her heartless, and wonder how she can play with men's feelings as she does; but she can look back half a dozen years (Miss Van Eyck is twenty-six, and speaks of her teens as having come to an end about the time of the flood), and remember when she didn't have to ask herself if she loved. The slender hands press each other hard even now as she thinks of that period in her life. She had sworn to herself, then that her heart was killed, and that love was a thing never to be thought of again without a shudder; but, as years went and she amused herself so well apparently, she began to wish for that happiness that had come to other girls, and to feel that it alone can make a woman's life complete.

But with all the will in the world, it isn't easy for some natures to love twice!

Better than she has liked any one for years, she knows she likes Stuart Eustice, and a smile that softens her face wonderfully creeps over it, as she remembers the falter in his pleasant voice, the light in his grave eyes, when he had said that she must see him tomorrow.

If he were not to come, if he were to go away without saying more, would it be his presence she should miss, or only the brilliant future his wealth can give her?

Nonsense! She rises, still smiling softly to herself, though the skies should fall, he will come; for all her cynicism of bitter experience, she believes in this pleasant, easy-going gentleman, with a faith as perfect as a child in its mother!

If only she were as sure of herself! Then she tells herself that at twenty-six one can't afford to sit up all night, and that it is a woman's duty to keep herself fair for her lover—her lover!

Miss Van Eyck colors as she says the word over softly, and then tells herself sternly that she is growing schoolgirlish and idiotic.

It is near four o'clock, and the afternoon sun is shining through the flowers in the windows just as brightly as if it were spring anywhere else, instead of winter in Rome.

Mrs. Van Eyck has gone for her drive alone, and is just as sure of what is going to happen as if it has already come to pass; and 'with a smile on her lip and a tear in her eye,' is dreaming very pleasant dreams, though they are only a middle-aged mother's!

Bertie is writing—that is, she pretends to herself that she is so occupied—but she seems to have very little interest in her correspondent, for she stops and listens every time a fiacre rattles through the street; and when, at last, there comes a ring, she bends closer over her paper than she has yet.

Some one knocks, and she rises quietly, looking just pleasantly expectant, when the door opens for the servant, who has a note on a salver.

'No answer?' she asks as she takes it.

'No, Mademoiselle.'

Then she sits down [and opens the note, smiling to herself bitterly, as she thinks that the lover she has dreamed of would have let nothing but a matter of life or death keep him from such an engagement.

'When you told me last night that I might see you this afternoon, I believed that no human possibility could prevent my coming! I have received news by cable, which will oblige me to leave Rome to-night, in order to catch the steamer from Liverpool on Saturday. Our bank has failed, and though I am only a silent partner, my presence is required in New York as soon as possible. I think you will guess a little what it is to me to be obliged to leave you now; perhaps, some time, I may be able to tell you. Until then, or if that time never comes, believe that I am always your,

'STUART EUSTACE.'

She read it slowly three times, and then the colors which had faded from her face, rushed back to the very roots of her hair: her dark eyes grew quite brilliant, and quickly, as if afraid of giving herself time to think, she sat down at her desk, and wrote one line:

'DEAR MR. EUSTACE:—Will you think me very exacting if I ask you to come to me for just five minutes?'

BERTIE VAN EYCK.

With nervous haste, very unlike the calm of which she was usually so proud, she dispatches a servant with the note, and throwing herself on a sofa, covers her face with her hands, and sits motionless for near half a hour.

When Mr. Eustace enters at the end of that time, she goes to meet him, putting out both hands, with the sweetest smile that could light a woman's face—or, at least, he thinks so.

'Poor fellow!' she says, half gaily, half tenderly. 'You look as if you hadn't slept for a month, instead of one night.'

He holds her hands in silence, while his eyes look straight into hers, and then turns away.

'I ought to be ashamed of myself if I look knocked up so soon,' he says, with an evident effort. 'It doesn't speak well for my endurance, does it?'

'Sit down, please,' she says, speaking very gravely now, 'and tell me what you can. Is it ruin?'

'I can't tell you, but it looks as if it would be worse.'

He had not seated himself, but stood leaning against the mantelpeice, his face turned away from her.

'What do you mean?'

'Disgrace? My partner has absconded with a large amount of money.'

'But surely no one can blame you!' she cries, eagerly.

'It was our name people trusted to,' he says, still not looking at her, and speaking with quiet despondency, as if quite unconscious of any special merit in what he was saying. 'I am in hopes that my own private fortune, which was not invested in the bank, may cover the deficiency; but, of course, I can't know if it will be enough until I reach New York.'

Her eyes are shining, the color is coming and going; she never was half so lovely as now.

'You will give up everything?'

'Of course. It is the only way to save the credit of my father's name—poor father who was so proud of our stainless credit!' He turned toward her with rather a poor attempt at a smile. 'I had better go before I make a fool of myself! I know why you sent for me. It was like the sweet woman you are! God bless you!'

He takes her hand; they are standing close together.

'I—I dont think you quite know,' she falters. 'If I could only tell you how brave I think you! How proud I am that you—that you—'

'Don't! Oh, my dearest! don't be so good to me now, when I have no right to tell you what you are to me!

She is very pale, and her eyes are full of tears, though they meet his passionate gaze fearlessly.

'Must I ask you to tell me?' she says softly.

* * * *

That was a year since, and as he had something left after paying the debts of the firm, and is earning a good salary, Mrs. Matthews told some one at the wedding, last month, that Miss Van Eyck had shown a great deal of good sense in taking Mr. Eustace, for she certainly was going off very fast, and he would have undoubtedly been her last chance.

L. Farjeon, Sarah Bernhardt, William Black, Mrs. Oliphant, Hugh Conway, and others.

A story of enthralling interest, entitled WILLARD'S WEIRD, by Miss Braddon, is now running in THE DAILY and WEEKLY GLOBE, and will be continued till completed. It will be succeeded by a story from the powerful pen of JUSTIN McCARTHY, and after the last named story is completed there will follow one from R. L. FARJEON, the famous novelist.

In addition to the above continued story, there are always running in the 12 and 3 o'clock editions of DAILY, and in THE WEEKLY GLOBE one or more additional novels by authors of world-wide repute. By this manner readers get five or six complete novels each year.

AS AN AGRICULTURAL NEWSPAPER THE WEEKLY GLOBE IS UNSURPASSED.

SPURGEON'S SERMON

(Revised by Spurgeon's own hand) given every week in Saturday's DAILY GLOBE and in THE WEEKLY GLOBE, under special and exclusive arrangement for the Dominion of Canada. The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon is, beyond question, the most widely-read preacher in the world, and is always racy, practical and instructive.
