FAGIN DENS OF PRESENT DAY

London Not Without Its Schools For Thieves

YOUTHS MADE CRIMINALS

Paris and Other Capitals Also Have Them — In Berlin Was Found an "Academy" Where Graduates Were Given Certificates

(London Standard).

More than thirty complaints have been received by the police from persons who state that they were robbed while waiting in a crowd to attend a political meeting at Cricklewood this week, and it is suggested that many of these thefts were committed by children specially trained for the task.

It is recognized amongst the police that many "schools," often run by old "timers," exist in London and other thickly populated areas where young pupils are taught the A. B. C. of crime. Watch "snatching" is the principal lesson the ambitious youngster has to learn, but he receives systematic instruction in the extraction of letters from pillar-boxes by means of weighted lines covered with bird-lime and a pilfering from the tills of small shops with sticks dipped in treacle.

"There is not a doubt that these schools do exist," said a police official to a representative. "Until within a week ago, in a little thoroughfare between Cable-street and Commercial-road, there was a residence, apparently as respectable as any in the East-end, which was a veritable incubating house for young thieves. It was well known to the mission workers in the locality and to the police, but the principals always proved too wary to be trapped. Children of fifteen years and upwards were trained there, 'snatching' and many forms of pocket-picking. The people have disappeared now, though I doubt whether their operations are at an end. The fact that we find pickpockets adopting the same old methods, the same schemes of 'passing' and 'covering' proves that these tricks are handed down from generation to generation. It pays to teach children, for they are very often cleverer at the business than men and women, and not so likely to be suspected. Some revel in the excitement of the thing, others are bullied into it.

"Like pocket-picking, burglary is also taught. It takes a good deal of hard training before a big burglary or safe-opening operation can be successfully accomplished. The higher branches of safe-breaking require great skill and considerable scientific knowledge. The elaborate knowledge of up-to-date 'dynamiting' methods and the use of complicated tools is not learned by casual handling of them. Some one teaches the expert his business. Who? Ah, we should like to know. There is no limit to the nerve of some of the professionals. Only a short time ago a well-known detective himself went through the East-end and was robbed of his watch and chain, which was returned to him a few days later with the compliments of the thief.

Tricks of Thieves

"One trainer of thieves provided a notable capture for an observant officer in a West-end square a year or two ago. The detective noticed a man, well dressed and prosperous looking, standing to light a pipe in the street. The man struck match after match and could not get it to light. The officer started to investigate, and found that, although the man kept applying matches to his pipe, no smoke appeared, so he concealed himself and waited. Within two minutes after one or two more matches had been struck, a boy of some twelve years of age came cautiously out of an empty house carrying a sack from which sticks protruded, and approached the stranger. The officer pounced on the youngster when he spoke to the man, and both denied they had ever seen one another before. However, the sack was opened, and £4,000 worth of jewels were found at the bottom. It appeared afterwards that the thief had obtained an order to view the empty house, and had taken an impression of the key. The plan of the empty house was practically the plan of the rest of the houses in the square. A well-trained youngster who could climb a bit did the 'business.' The match-striking, of course, was only a method of signalling. Most of the 'habituals' are made between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, and 75 per cent., I dare say, have been trained in thieves' houses."

Many of the academies of burglary are situated on the continent, and give us the benefits of their "graduates" when their time for military service approaches. In this way the fame of East-end "schools" is noised abroad. It is astonishing, but true, that a youngster of 13 years, who was but a few years ago arrested in Belgrade as an incorrigible rogue, burst into tears before the magistrate and begged to be sent to London, where, he had heard, he would be able to do well if he could go to one of the East-end schools, where the pupils were taught how to live without molesting any but rich people who had more than they wanted!

Paris is notorious for "academies of crime," which reached the height of their popularity when the exploits of the Apaches had stimulated the desire for notoriety in the mind of many a low class French youth. In 1900 there was discovered in the square of St. Jacques a "school," whose activities had assumed gigantic proportions. Here, with painstaking care, lads of sixteen to eighteen years were taught the best way of attacking people by night, how to butt, the use of the knife and the garotte. A raid was made on this breeding-ground of criminals one day, when a number of them were receiving a "lecture," and fifteen pupils and their "professors" were arrested.

The trial of a thief at Cologne a short time ago disclosed the fact that he was a graduate of a recognized "high school for pickpockets" at Essen, which despatched proficient cut-purses to all parts of Germany. In Berlin in 1911 there was discovered a similar den where burglary was taught on the most approved lines by experts, the "principal" being an old convict. Before graduating at this institution each student was rigorously examined in the various branches of his chosen profession, and, if successful, was granted a leaving certificate, which was equivalent to a degree in burglary. The terms for training, board and lodging were a fixed sum and a percentage of profits gained during the first year in the "profession."

The cost of operating New York hospitals, as far as supplies and expenses of nursing and domestic service are concerned, has nearly doubled in the last eight years.

The Sentiments of St. Valentine's Day Are Best Expressed by The Language of Flowers

Revive fond memories of her youth by sending mother a box of flowers. Add to the enjoyments of the day for wife or sweetheart by sending her our special offering of violets or other spring flowers. Her appreciation will be increased by the neatness and freshness of the gift if the order is filled by us, as our flowers are all grown in our own greenhouses, Sandy Point road. Do not disappoint your friends by sending imported flowers which do not last. Be assured of their freshness by buying from K. Pedersen, Ltd., Market bldg., 49 Charlotte street. 1452-2—14.

A somewhat angular, severe-looking spinster was standing on the station platform outside a mail-coach, inspecting, with undisguised curiosity, the ingenious net arrangement which is slung to sweep in mail-bags while the train is in swift motion.

"Is she working all right?" asked on of the officials.

"Ay, ay, Bill," replied his mate, when suddenly the lady touched him on the shoulder.

"Why do you call it 'she?' she inquired, as usual athirst for information.

"Because, madam, it's a mail catcher," replied the courteous official.

And the sniff of the anglar spinster almost drowned the shrill whistle of the engine then preparing to move off.

"SAFETY" COMMITTEES ON C. P. R.

"Safety First" is a motto which the C. P. R. has been drilling into the employes of the road during recent months, and an organization, consisting of safety committees on each division, has been built up to help in the work. An analysis of the accidents which occur on the road in the course of the year shows that most of them are due to the carelessness of employes, and it is this which the company is trying to overcome. Their object is to make the road as safe as is humanly possible for passengers, for employes and for freight.

Humanitarian reasons bulk largely in the adoption of this policy, but it also carries compensation from a business standpoint, in greater efficiency and reduced costs for repairs and damages. The company takes every mechanical protection possible. All this is unavailing, however, if the men who are handling the trains are not as careful as they should be. The company has no use for a man who will take a chance. It does not do in the railway business.

The first step towards securing the co-operation of the men was the formation of the safety committees composed of employes whose duty it is to pass on safety devices, to investigate the causes of accidents, and to make recommendations for the better protection of lives and property. This work is supervised from Montreal, and is encouraged by the publication of literature on the subject. One form which this literature takes is the description of accidents which have occurred and which are due to carelessness. The fault is pointed out as a warning to others.
