CHAPTER VIII.

Goldie's Escape.

"Then, by Heaven, I will marry you!" replied Guy Marston, with emphasis.

"Oh, no. No, no, no! I cannot marry you. I am married already. Let me go away and die!"

"Listen to me. I know that no impure thought ever dwelt in your young heart. If he has deserted you, I will obtain a divorce for you, and you shall become my wife——"

"Stop! If you are an honorable man, you will go and leave me to my sad thoughts."

Her words touched his heart, callous as it was, and he respected her feelings, but resolved to talk with her again on the morrow, and no thought of her ultimate refusal to listen to him ever entered his brain.

He accordingly bid her a respectful "good-night," bowed low over her head and retired. Early the following morning Goldie again made the attempt to leave the house. This time the doors were unlocked, and she found no difficulty in getting upon the street. It was quite early, and the streets were comparatively quiet. Goldie walked rapidly on until she came to a street where there seemed to be a great many milliners' shops. She resolved to endeavor to obtain employment in one of these, and, feeling faint and hunugry—not having eaten anything since noon of the previous day—she entered a neat-looking eating house upon a pleasant street but a little way off, and leisurely ate a good breakfast.

Before noon she had succeeded in obtaining a situation with a milliner who desired an apprentice, and wished her to commence work immediately. In spite of Goldie's trouble, she went bravely on about her tasks, and bore her wretched lot with firmness.

Mrs. Keller's millinery establishment was a good place for a young girl who desired to learn the trade; for Mrs. Keller was both humane and upright. She pitied Goldie's friendless situation, and at once enlisted her sympathies in her behalf. There were six other girls in Mrs. Keller's employ, and four of them lived with their friends, while the others hired a room together, furnished it, and boarded themselves. They lived very comfortably, and Mrs. Keller often visited them for a few moments of an evening. At this lady's suggestion, the two young girls invited Goldie to share their humble apartment.

"There is plenty of room for a single bed in there," said one, "and you can pay your share of the expenses."

This Goldie agreed to do, and when the evening came she went home with the two girls. It was a neat, quiet place, and the furniture was new and clean, although of the very cheapest kind. Goldie showed her check to Mrs. Keller, and she went with her to get it cashed. With a part of this Goldie bought her little furniture and paid a week's board in advance.

CHAPTER IX.

Goldie Again Homeless.

It was very pleasant to come home from the shop after a day of toil to the neat, well-kept room where the three apprentices lived. Upon a pleasant street, in a plain brick house these girls had secured a large square room up one flight.

In this room were three large windows, two of them filled with plants. Thrifty climbing petunias, with its, many-colored, bell-shaped blossoms; green, hardy English ivy creeping over the large trellis, across the window, where it formed a curtain of living green. The girls had placed twine in diamon-shaped pattern across the casement, and the vine, true to its nature, clung and twined itself over around the delicate trellis until it was indeed a bower of beauty.

Upon the broad window sill were pots of deep-hued carnation pinks, filling the room with rare fragrance. Geraniums and monthly roses completed the array, and to those young girls, away from home and friends, the companionship of their silent, blooming plants was more than you can well imagine, unless you have known how much anything that lives, yet cannot speak, can be to a lonely heart.

Upon the floor a bright-hued carpet rendered the room inviting to the feet, and the walls boasted two pictures and a mirror. Facing the door stood the one article of furniture of any importance—a handsomely carved bureau. It looked strangely out of place in that room, and a word of its history may not be out of place.

One of the girls, Mary Carter, was the daughter of a once wealthy family. Doctor Carter had been a well-known physician in New York City. But, failing in an enterprise in which he had rashly invested all his available funds, he became poor; and, unable to bear the change to poverty, he took his own life. Everything in the house was sold at auction excepting the old-fashioned bureau, which Mrs. Carter declared should not go under the hammer, as it had descended to her from her grandmother, who was an English lady of rank. In this old bureau was stored an abundance of bed and table linen, towels, and underclothing, and upon the death of her mother, which occurred a few months after the auction, Mary found its contents to be of great value to her.

The other occupant of the room was Julia Davis, a pretty little girl from the country, also an orphan. The two girls together had purchased the carpet and bed, with a good secondhand cooking stove, and a limited supply of crockery.

Now that Goldie was to come to live with them, it became necessary that she should pay her part of the expenses, besides furnishing an extra bed and her own crockery. She gladly consented to this, and in that cheerful room experienced more of real comfort than she had known since her departure from home.

She lived in this manner until nearly the last of January. One evening about this time Mrs. Keller, who had always taken a great interest in Goldie, requested her to remain after the other girls had left the shop. She did so, drawing a chair beside the girl, Mrs. Keller took her hand, and, after a moment of silence, said:

"My dear girl, for several days I have had serious doubts about you. If I have wronged you, you will pardon me, I am sure. Your blushes and downcast eyes assure me that you are conscious of my suspicions. I do not wish to humble you by a confession. Only tell me if you are truly a worthy and virtuous girl?"

Burying her face in her cold hands, Goldie sobbingly confessed her situation, and began to explain something of the cause that had led to it, not omitting, of course, the secret marriage.

But Mrs. Keller interrupted her, saying:

"God should be your judge. He knows whether you have been sinned against or sinning. Perhaps you are married, and perhaps not; but, at any rate, it is not right that you should remain here. Others may become suspicious, and the character of my house injured by your remaining. You can remain at your room until you find another home. Mary Carter and Julia Davis are both worthy girls, and I cannot allow a breath of scandal to fal around them through you. I am sorry for you, but justice to the other girls demands that I insist upon your finding another home."

"Oh, Mrs. Keller! I am utterly friendless; where can I go?"

"You can go to the almshouse!" continued Mrs. Keller.

Goldie searched that pitiless face for one ray of hope. In vain. The heart was closed against her, and without a word more, the hunted girl left the shop.

Wearily she ascended the stairs leading to the pleasant room that was all of home for her, and heeded not the pleasant greetings of her companions, nor answered their various questions concerning the cause of her detention.

"What is the matter, Goldie?" asked Mary Carter, after an hour of weeping upon Goldie's part.

The poor girl lifted her pale face and replied:

"I am not to go to the shop any more! Oh, what will become of me?"

"Not to go to the shop anymore?" cried both the girls in a breath.

"Why, only yesterday Mrs. Keller told a visitor that you were the best apprentice she had!" exclaimed Julia.

"Never mind, Goldie, you shall stay here with us, and you can get a job in some other shop; or you can take in sewing or embroidery," said Mary Carter.

Goldie did not reply to their comforting words, but lay upon her bed where she had thrown herself, in her grief, until the city clock chimed ten. Then she arose, undressed, and went to a sleepless pillow.

The next morning she was more calm, and, after Mary and Julia had gone to their work, she commenced to sew upon some tiny garments carefully locked away in her trunk.

Four weeks passed in this way, and then Mrs. Keller sent for Goldie to come to her. It was only to order her departure from the house where the two apprentices lived.

Goldie listened in silence, and returned to her home. She informed Mary and Julia of Mrs. Keller's command.

They were quite indignant, and declared that they would remonstrate with the cruel woman.

"It is of no use, girls," answered Goldie. "When I tell you all, you wil be as ready for me to go as you are now for me to stay."

Bending her golden head until it rested upon Mary's shoulder, she told her horrified listeners the reason of Mrs. Keller's course.

Julia Davis made no reply to this confession, but Mary Carter exclaimed:

"You shall not go! Stay here, and we will take care of you!"

"Think of the stain upon your name!" said Goldie.

"I have thought of that," continued Mary; "and, in spite of everything, you shall stay! Iam not entirely heartless, nor will I ever consent to aid in crushing still lower a poor, forsaken sister! Not because others have betrayed and forsaken you, dear Goldie, will I do the same. You shall stay with me!"

"Then I shall go!" replied Julia.

Mary Carter turned one withering glance upon her roommate, exclaiming:

"Go, then!"

Goldie assured them that she would not remain to cause trouble between them, but should go away upon the morrow.

Alas, how vain are our calculations! When the morrow dawned, Goldie Mellen lay tossing with fever, and for many weary days Mary Carter remained out of the shop to attend the suffering friend. Then came the slow convalescence, and not until the warm breath of spring had clothed the earth with verdure did she recover sufficiently to admit of her removal.

One day in April Mrs. Keller made her appearance in the room where Goldie sat sewing. Without any preparatory remarks, this woman ordered the poor girl to pack up her possessions and leave the house.

Goldie obeyed, gathering her scanty wardrobe into a large reticule.

Mrs. Keller stood calmly by while she put on her hat and shawl, and then folowed her from the room out upon the street. At the door, Mrs. Keller said:

"Take my advice, Goldie, and go at once to the authorities for a home in the almshouse. You will be well cared for there, and no one will dare question you——"

"Spare yourself any anxiety on my account," said Goldie, interrupting her. "What can you care for the welfare of a poor, wretched girl that you have driven out of her home to face the scorn of a pitiless world when her nature cries out for seclusion and sympathy? Great as my sin has been, yours is greater; for you have a woman's experience, and should pity a woman's woe. May God deal with you as you have dealt with me, Mrs. Keller;" and before the woman could reply Goldie had turned away from her, and was walking rapidly down the street.

Mrs. Keller shrugged her shoulders, muttering:

"The impudence of the girl!" and returned to her fashionable shop.

When Mary Carter returned to her room at night she found Goldie's place vacant, and a brief note informing her of the cause of her departure.

"Strange that Mrs. Keller should be so cruel to Goldie when she has proved herself to be one of the best of woman in every respect," said Mary, after she had read the note.

As we may not meet Mary Carter again, we may as well inform her friends that she afterward married a wealthy young physician, and is today one of the most benevolent ladies in New York City.

The Stomach Needs Help

The liver, kidneys and bowels must be kept active with DR. CHASE'S KIDNEY-LIVER PILLS.

The liver and kidneys are overworked in their efforts to remove the poisonous waste matter from the system. They fail and become torpid and clogged. The bowels become constipated and stomach derangements follow.

There is one medicine which will overcome this condition more certainly and more quickly than any other, and this is Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills.

This medicine gets the bowels in action at once and by awakening the liver and kidneys ensures the thorough cleansing of the filtering and excretory systems.

With the poisonous obstructions removed, the digestive system resumes its healthful condition, appetite improves, pains and aches disappear as well as irritability and depression.

You cannot imagine a more satisfactory treatment. One pill a dose, 25 cents a box, at all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Toronto.

Dr. Bovel's Herb and Gum Salve

better than all others for Eczema.

Woodland, Alta.

Dear Sirs:—

"I bought one box of Dr. Bovel's Herb and Gum Salve for Eczema, and it has helped me wonderfully. I have tried several kinds of salve and ointment, and found nothing to help me like Dr. Bovel's Herb and Gum Salve."

Yours truly,
MRS. E. FLEMING.

The above testimonial plainly tells what that pure healing salve can do for you if afflicted with any skin disease.

And—remember that Dr. Bovel's Salve is a boon to the working class, since it is sold at a price well within the reach of all.

Dr. Bovel's Home Remedies are sold by all dealers. Ask for them. If not obtainable through your dealer within a reasonable time, send 25c (in stamps) to us for any article you require. Bovel Mfg. Co'y. St. John's, Nfld.
