CHATHAM, N. B., - - MARCH 22, 1894.

GREENE JONES.

It was in the summer of 188— that I made the acquaintance of Miss Lola Reeder. I had been complaining to a friend of mine of the tameness and dullness of existence, with nothing to do or to think about, when she said: "Oh; you haven't outlived everything; there's something to interest you, yet. I'll take you to see Miss Lola."

"And who is 'Miss Lola?'"

"She's the dearest little old maid you ever saw in your life. Her name is Reeder, but everybody calls her Miss Lola. You shall see her first, and I will tell you about her afterward."

So, in search of a new sensation, I went with Stella Lakin to visit this "little old maid."

She lived in a tiny cottage, quaint and old fashioned, set down, like a doll's house, in the center of a wide sweep of ground, bought when land was cheap, before the village had attained city dimensions, and held onto in spite of many pecuniary inducements to part with it in the interest of urban progress. On either side of her were blocks of city buildings—terraces with their long flights of sandstone steps leading up to forbidding looking three story fronts, which faced the street with their hot, red brick stare of stolid indifference, giving no suggestions of home or happiness within their walls. But between them lay the sweep of Miss Lola's bright green lawn, the borders full of pinks and bachelor's buttons, her porch trellised with nasturtium in riotous bloom, and a shoal of sweet peas growing in pink and white perfection.

At the north of the house were roses, not La France nor Hermets nor any of the cultivated favorites of present fashion, but cinnamons and damasks and homely hundred leafs and velvets and impertinent little burgundies with their prim floral disks, pretending to a legal kinship with the queen of flowers.

"Can you tell what there is at the back of the house?" asked Stella, smiling.

"Oh, yes," said I, "hollyhocks and marigolds and southernwood and Jerusalem cherries and sweet williams and live forever and lemon balm"——

"You have the power of divination," said she.

I found Miss Lola just what I had conjectured her to be from such environments. She was little and prim, but graceful and genial. Her cheek bore the color of a winter apple, which did not vary. She had tender, dark gray eyes. Her hair was a little silvered, but soft and crinkly, and the top of her head was covered with a square of "bobinet," edged with thread lace. Her gown was of an old fashioned pattern of purple chintz and made in the ancient style of round waist and full skirt that, having swung around a 30 years' circle, is with us once again. About the neck of this there was a little lace ruffle, softening the outlines of a fair, fine skinned throat that had begun to wither a little.

Miss Lola received us with cheerful graciousness, but offer setting us chairs went on with her knitting. She knit very rapidly and made use of an old fashioned quill sheath at her side for holding her temporarily superfluous needles. It was a little, long legged red yarn stocking on which she was busily engaged.

I remarked that it looked rather warm for the season, but she told me she had to knit all summer to have them ready for the first cold snap."

Stella explained, "Miss Lola had a fad for giving away stockings and mittens to poor little girls and their mammas, but never to poor little boys and their papas—oh, no!" said Stella, with dancing eyes.

Miss Lola pursed up her lips and shook her head. "Oh, no!" echoed she. "Men were deceivers ever."

We made a long call on Miss Lola, and with simple unconventionality she showed us her radiantly clean and dainty house and her stock of hose and mittens, gathered sweet bouquets of her garden treasures for us and asked us on leaving to come back again.

When Stella had donated some skins of red yarn toward her charities and we were on our way home, she told me Miss Lola's story.

When Lola was 10 years old, her father had a clerk of 18 in his store who boarded in the family. His name was Greene Jones. No doubt he considered himself vastly Lola's senior. He petted the child, named her favorite doll Eva Roberta and called her—Miss Lola—his "little wife" and "Mrs. Greene Jones." She must have been a child of deep and sensitive feelings. She believed herself really his sweetheart and thought that when she had grown up they would be married. She sat beside him at the table, and on her birthday and holidays he gave her pretty trinkets and books with bright covers, containing such thrilling tales as "The Little Orange Girl" and "Mary's First Falsehood." Among the gifts of this adolescent youth, who was largely composed of legs and arms, was a pink coral necklace and a locket that contained a very indistinct, scared looking picture that "featured" Greene Jones to a T.

One day, when he was 20 years old and Miss Lola was 12, he went on a week's vacation. He kissed her before going and said: "Goodby, little sweetheart! Don't forget me!" She cried herself to sleep that night. In a week after he came back in company with a stoop shouldered young person, with two interminable noses and weak eyes, who wore a bright yellow ribbon on her bonnet, and whom he introduced to the family as "Mrs. Greene Jones." Miss Lola stared at them both for a moment in indignant amazement and then in the general handshaking disappeared from the room. She went to her doll's cradle in the nursery and lifted Eva Roberta in her arms. The doll, sleeping peacefully, knew not that danger was near. All unconscious of her coming doom, she was carried to the one door, and her china brains were there viciously beaten out. The "Little Orange Girl" and the coral necklace and locket were led to the kitchen fire. Miss Lola then wrote in her childish diary: "I have been deceaved by Grean Jones. I shall never luv another. I will be a man hater."

"And," said Stella, "she has kept her vow. She turned 'queer' from that time on—lovely and charitable to women and children, but a hater to men and boys. When she was a young woman, her parents died and left her that house and a tidy sum of money. She knits and sews for the poor. She raises her flowers for the sick and sorrowful—old fashioned ones to remind them of old homes and speak to their hearts. They know her well at the hospitals and the 'Open Door.' Sometimes she walks the streets after nightfall with a bunch of these flowers in her hand. When she sees a painted Magdalene under the gaslight she goes up and gives them to her and says: 'Take these flowers, my dear. Think of God and your mother and try to be good.' Oh," concluded Stella, "I wish my life amounted to half as much as hers does."

Miss Lola died suddenly a few nights later of heart disease. Among the piles of smooth lavender scented linen in one of her bureau drawers the women who "laid her out" found a paper labeled "My Last Will and Testament." When it came to be probated, it was found that it did not leave her estate or any part of it to the church, the hospital nor the "Open Door" for Magdalenes. It was all devised and bequeathed to "my old friend, Greene Jones, now living in Rutland, Vt., who is said to be sick and poor, with the request that he and his wife and only remaining child make their future home in this cottage, which has been my home for 20 years. My only condition is that they keep the flowers blooming for those who are unhappy and ill."

"That proves," said Stella, after hearing the news, "that she wasn't a man hater after all.—Minnie W. Baines-Miller in Cincinnati Post.

A LATE HARVEST.

My Lady has been very successful. She has, in fact, only one daughter left upon her hands. And Maggie, after being, indeed, unnecessarily troublesome upon the point, is now engaged to the perfectly eligible son of an old love of my Lady's own.

"Very romantic, isn't it?" says my lady. She puts up a double-barrelled eyeglass to look at the young people, who are standing side by side, and appear bored.

Someone says that it is quite deliciously so.

"And romance is getting so uncommon, too," adds my lady, with a sigh My Lady has, indeed, been able to squeeze no sort of romance into the former matrimonial arrangements she has made. Romance is usually so ineligible, one finds.

My Lady and Sir George, who is the old love, find themselves alone presently.

"Not the conservatory, for Heaven's sake!" says Sir George, who has much rheumatism and only a little sentiment. And they take two deep arm chairs in an ante-room.

"You have theories upon heredity, I see," says Sir George. Sir George is spoken of by his youthful acquaintance as a sardonic old beast. In the fifties, after the manner of that period, my Lady used frequently to shake her coquettish head at him, and address him as a dreadful, shocking, sarcastic creature.

"One has theories upon everything," she answers. "It is expected of one. And theories are so cheap. But I don't know that I have ever gone in for heredity."

"No?" says Sir George. "It seems to me you have a particularly complex theory on the subject. A young lady has a first love. He is ineligible. One's loves always are. The young lady marries someone else. She has a daughter. She expects, of course she has a right to expect, that the daughter should fall in love with the son of her old love. The case sounds a little confusing as I have stated it. It will, I assure you, work out clearly on paper."

"What are you driving at?" says my Lady. If her complexion admitted of changes, it might be at this moment a shade paler than before. "Do you mean that you don't wish your boy to marry Maggie?"

"I wish it before all things in the world," answers Sir George.

"Then what do you mean?" says my Lady, with impatience.

"I think I mean," says Sir George, with that evenness of tone which betrays nothing, "that it is just possible Jack and Maggie may not want to marry each other. That Jack agrees to marry Maggie because it is expedient and he has not yet seen anyone he likes better. And that Maggie agrees to marry Jack because she is highly susceptible to—shall we say home influence?—and because the person she does like better, won't do."

"Are you so romantic?" says my Lady, with a rising temper and a neat sarcasm, "as to believe in love in a cottage, and the wisdom of an ignorant girl's first fancy.

"My dear Maria," answers Sir George, "I am so old as to have few beliefs of any description left to me. Love matches are notoriously miserable. The lovers have but one cause to congratulate themselves. They are wretched in their own way."

"Which you consider better than being happy in anyone else's?"

Sir George bows an assent and looks at my Lady with deep eyes.

"You propose, then," and my Lady's gloved hand trembles a little, "that I go to Maggie and say to her, 'Marry the penniless fool in your ignorant fancies'; and that you should, in the highest moral tone at your command, impress upon your son the wickedness of the expedient."

"You put it neatly," says Sir George, "that is precisely what I do mean."

There is a short silence. In the lamp light these two look at each other curiously. Through the open door which leads into the ballroom they catch a glimpse of Maggie, with a momentary light and color on her face, dancing with inexpedience.

"What has brought you to such a state of feelings?" asks my Lady in tones which are not perfectly steady.

"Heaven knows," says Sir George, "I do not. Unless it be that Maggie reminds me of some woman I once knew and know no longer. I remember that woman at twenty, forced by the cursed ambition of her relatives into a worldly marriage. I remember her simple and sorrowful and unworldly and good. I am not romantic—heaven forbid—but I can see, to night, as if it had all happened yesterday, the tears in her pretty eyes and the droop about her mouth. She is hard and sensible enough now. It is from such an ending I would save her daughter."

My Lady's eyelashes are wet and her voice broken. "Ah!" she says, "that is all very well, but how can we tell that we should have been happy? How can we tell?"

"We cannot," he answers in his old manner. "It is probable we should have quarrelled. An inability to pay the importunate and necessary butcher is always ruffling to the temper. We should have had to start life out of South Kensington, which is in itself a tragedy. You would have had to employ a cheap dressmaker, which I am told is sufficient to blight any woman's happiness. We should have grumbled of course. That is a satisfaction which is denied to no one. But we should have chosen our own fashion of being miserable. Suppose we accord this privilege to our children."

"It is horribly ridiculous and unpractical and bourgeois," begins my Lady.

"And moral" adds Sir George, "and we are none of those things. Do you see Maggie over there with the Expedient? They look a little dull. They have been together two interminable cotillion dances I believe, which accounts for it. Yet I have been told that people frequently fall in love with each other after marriage when they are together eternally. What do you think?"

"I think," says my Lady very low, "that I am going to make a fool of myself."

And Sir George takes her hand and raises it to his lips.—Black and White.
