New York Financial Bureau.

New York, May 16—Bullish specialty operations seem likely again this week in the stock market. The Sun also suggests now that a creeping bull market may be underway. Purchases on slight recessions seem to us to be advisable. Daily operators will find it advantageous to buy for turns when aggressive action is found in special stocks after a period of individual declines. It may be found that the policy is one of specific advance and recessions. Developments over Sunday do not appear to be of great importance.

The bank statement shows a gratifying increase in surplus reserve that may work to bring down rates for money during the current week. Crop advices over the end of the week appear to be very satisfactory while trade news of an encouraging character. We think improvement will be found in copper industry in the not distant future. There does not appear to be the development of any adverse factor of consequence politically while financially and commercially the outlook is good in brief.

Press comment and market literature are conservatively hopeful. The technical position of stock market is good, and specialists seem to think support will be extended whenever necessary to check hammering on account of the new financing ahead. Our information leads to conservatively bullish on the standard list. Steel may do better today. Our information is favorable to Virginia Chemical. Reading may be raised against shorts in near future. Rubber and C. P. R. should be bought on reactions for turns.

THE OVERSEAS REPRESENTATIVES AT KING'S FUNERAL

London, May 16—The Canadian Associated Press learns that, on his secretary drawing atention to the announcement that representatives of overseas dominions were not to take part in the funeral of the king, Lord Strathcona immediately communicated with the colonial office, vigorously protesting against such treatment, the result being that the representtives will have place in St. George's Chapel.

The Canadian office was closed today, but it is unofficially stated that the colonial office was severely taken to task, it being pointed out that the representatives of Canada were coming spontaneously to express Canada's sense of loss and were deserving of more consideration and that if such treatment as it had been proposed to show Canada's representatives were not modified would cause much comment in Canada.

Ottawa, Ont., May 16—(Special) Commander Stewart has left for England to bring out the Rainbow. Commander C. O. Roper has arrived here to take his place on the naval staff.

POTSDAM, THE ROYAL PLAYGROUND

One writer has called Potsdam "the Prussian Versailles," and it is certainly "the city of blood and iron," comprising, as it does, the stern, autocratic qualities of the Hohenzollerns.

To enjoy Potsdam the better, one should acquaint himself with the history of Frederick the Great before visiting the quaint neighborhood of austere Berlin. It is better approached by that delightful series of narrow lakes known as the River Havel. By this route one passes Peacock Island, made famous by the rose garden planted there by Frederick William III. Voltaire, on first beholding Potsdam, exclaimed: "Potsdam is Sparata and Athens in one!"

It was in 1416 that the Hohenzollerns planted themselves at the Mark of Brandenburg. They seem to have had small use for Potsdam, for they mortgaged it again and again to abobts, knights and financiers of that day. During the Thirty Years' War Potsdam, the insignificant, suffered greatly, and save for her neighbor, Berlin, that rose so quickly to prominence, she would doubtless have dropped into oblivion. It was then that Potsdam became tht "Royal Playground."

It was the Great Elector who began the town castle which reached its completion under Frederick the Great.

One writer has called Berlin the Hohenzollerns' office and Potsdam their garden. The castle at Potsdam owes its greatness and beauty to Frederick William I. and Frederick the Great. The former discovered its utility, while the latter developed its beauty.

Some curious relics are to be seen at the town castle. Over the death bed of the Spartan king hang two pictures which were painted by the monarch's own hands during a siege of the gout. One has but to look at these feeble efforts toward art to realize that the painter was in an abnormal state of health and mind, for they are both crude and horrible. Only one suffering from the agonies of such a malady would inflict two such atrocities on his descendants.

The rooms which were occupied by Frederick the Great in the castle have been carefully kept in exactly the same condition as when that great monarch lived there, and it is most interesting to view his bed chamber, his council chamber, his library and dining hall, looking upon the very chairs and tables which were in his daily use. In the matter of his last resting place the wish of Frederick the Great was not observed. He lies in the Garrison church, in violation of his will. The following, pertaining to this matter, is quoted from a most interesting book, "Romantic Germany."

"His will left directions that he be buried with his favorite dog on the terrace before Sans Souci, but his successor cruelly buried him in the church beside his cruel father. When Napoleon visited the place he bowed the knee and exclaimed: 'If this one were alive, I would not now be here!' Then he stole the Conqueror's sword which hung above the grave. The German people have never forgiven this outrage, and by way of reparation have hung the church with mellow old standards captured from the French armies. When the first emperor placed his trophies there he exclaimed: 'God was with us. His alone is the glory.' In the royal vault one evening in 1805 Frederick William III. and Alexander I. of Russia sealed their friendship and laid the foundation of the Russo-German Alliance."
