BRIDGETOWN, NOVEMBER 23, 1876.

A SPLENDID LECTURE.

Our columns last week were so crowded with a fully detailed report of the business done at the recent Court of Sessions that we had not sufficient space for such a notice as was desirable of a discourse delivered in the Baptist Church on Sunday evening (10th inst.) by the Rev. Thomas Gales on the Liquor Traffic. This gentleman is the secretary of the Canadian Temperance Alliance—the object of which is the agitation of the teetotal question, with the ultimate view of obtaining the enactment of a Prohibitory Liquor Law. The lecture was based on the following text: "But if the ox were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death."—EXODUS XXI.—29.

In this Town, for many years, there has been no ackl of temperance advocates, who have occupied the platform or the pulpit. Some of them have been frothy enough. Others of them have been sound, and have made a good moral impression upon the minds of those who listened. Occasionally adventurous itinerants have visited our community, more intent upon precuniary results than upon upholding the temperance cause. They have succeeded in making audiences laugh at ludicrous pictures of the drunkard, and at stale jokes, which elicited applause, while no solemn impression was made respecting the matter discussed. But in the lecture by Mr. Gales there was an earnestness and moral potency which deeply affected his hearers. He made them feel that he was uttering intensely important truths, and that he was dealing with the temperance question in a masterly aud comprehensive manner.

The doctrines deduced from the text was personal responsibility for sins of omission. He pointed out a passive attitude in reference to temperance reforms is in effect little better than open hostility. Abstinence from intoxicants, so far as it goes, is commendable; but if not followed by action in reference to others and the well-being of communities it amounts to little. Such mere personal temperance is a farthing candle burning under a bushel. Drunkenness is now a wide spread and gigantic evil which seriously affects the morals and interests of the civilized world. The spirit of christianity, as well as patriotism and philantrophy, claims the co-operative energies of all right-minded people in efforts to subdue a most pestilent vice, that is fearfully ruinous to domestic, social and national prosperity. Its deleterious influence ramifies all ranks and conditions of men in the very heart of christendom and civilization.

Mr. Gales took a broad view of the moral evil in question and of the traffic which is perpetuating and extending it. We have often heard these matters eloquently and ably discussed; but never before so lucidly and impressively as by him. Of course it is not our purpose (nor have we room) to follow the lecturer in these remarks through the various phrases in which he exhibited drunkenness, and in the means that were propounded for its ultimate suppression. He insisted strongly upon the culture of such a moral public sentiment as would form a basis for successful and effective legislation in the restraining and eventual extinction of the liquor traffic. The whole lecture was replete with interest; and if right impressions were not made, and good resolves were not formed, it was not the fault of the lecturer.

A few remarks in reference to Mr. Gales himself may not be out of place. He is a man in the prime of life—perhaps between thirty and forty years of age—of a robust physique, and with a countenance which is expressive of ready perception and intellectual vigor. An observant stranger, seeing him in a crowd, would at once recognize him as no ordinary man. In his voice there is compass as well as clearness; and there is nothing monotonous in his tones. In his arguments there is admirable lucidity and logical strength. As far as language is concerned, he is faultlessly plain, perpicuous, and at times pleasingly elegant. While he is not barren in appropriate illustration, he is never florid, or betrayed into an attempt to render his utterances more attractive by artistic word painting. In all the characteristics of a public speaker he is the very opposite of some, to whom we have listened with little pleasure and no profit, and who are more intent to show off themselves than to elucidate the subject under discussion. This class of speakers endeavor by frothy declamation to cover sterility of intellect with a profusion of high-sounding words. No language, however glittering, can be satisfactorily substituted for momentous thoughts or valuable ideas. A redundancy of flashy polysyllables darkens, rather than brightness, what is uttered by a speaker. In these respects, Mr. Gales leaves nothing for the legitimate animadversion of the most fastidious critic. His purity, precision and happy choice of appropriate language give force to his utterances, scholastic attainments and thorough mental culture. Irrespective of all other considerations, the lecture was a rich intellectual treat.

THE UNITED STATES.

The political storm which has been raging in the neighboring Republic culminated fifteen days ago in the election of a new President. The party-elements late in fearful agitation, are now comparatively calm. The great struggle for party ascendancy is now over, and the language of violent vituperation is hushed. While one party is exultant, the other is chop-fallen. But we presume party acrimony will gradually subside, and the normal state of national quietude will again prevail. The quadrennial contests for the Presidental chair, must evermore preclude the possibility of political stagnation, and save the republic from that popular indifference to public affairs, which is more to be dreaded than the turbulence of party strife. When Washington occupied the Chair of State, there was not a man in one of all the States that would have preferred to see another in his place, although so early in the Republic's history, conflicting views, respecting its government and policy were strongly entertained, and parties were formed in accordance with the expressed opinion of the Federalists in North and the Democrats in the South. The parties then formed—the former headed by old John Adams of Massachusetts, and the latter by Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, who penned the Declaration of Independence.

Although the principles enunciated by these respective parties, during the vicissitudes of three fourths of a century, have advocated and upheld by political combinations under different names; yet the conflicting views, severally propounded by Adams and Jefferson, through all the intervening struggles and changes, partially modified perhaps, have been recognized, and are to-day as distinct and adverse to each other as they were at the opening of this century. There have been times when interests connected with trade and manufactures have been affected—when the question of slavery has been agitated—or when State rights were being matters of serious sectional controversary, there have been alienations from one party and attachment to the others by influential politicians; but the old lines of party demarcation still exist. The personnel of one party of late years has been a good deal augmented by a strong tide of immigration from Europe, especially from Ireland and Germany. Still the party struggle, which was tested by the ballot a fortnight ago, was based upon the time-venerated principles that were in conflict in the palmy days of Adams and Jefferson, who half a century ago, died on the same day—and that the anniversary day of the declared Independance of the nation. Their principles, however, survive, and will probably for many long years—it may be for centuries—be the chief matter to be considered and acted upon when a President is to be elected.

THE CENTENNIAL.

STOPPING THE GREAT ENGINE.

A Philadelphia paper of the 11th inst. says:—

Machinery Hall was the objective point of less than 15,000 persons at about two o'clock, yesterday, at which hour it was believed that the President would punctually appear in front of that mighty giant of mechanical skill, the Corliss engine, and seizing the lever stop the motion of colossus. In this speculation just as many individual were disappointed, notwithstanding which they held their places, or passed through the mazes of the intricate workshops Machinery Hall at 3 o'clock was packed with impatient humanity. A sea of upturned faces looked in the direction of the iron and steel giant which controlled the ceaseless revolving wheels, the whirring belts, and the noisy operation of the perfect labyrinth of mechanism Never before in the history of the Centennial Exposition had there been such a jam of nervous, anxious, and excited observers. It was the culminating and at once the finishing point in Americas' great exhibit. The great engine seemed more energetic than ever. Its walking-beams seemed to move with more rapidity, and the monster wheel appeared to revolve the more quickly, as if conscious of the fact that it would soon rest from its labors. Yet, though fancy or imagination pictured the grim colossus as working harder than ever, its movement was almost noiseless. The sewing-machines with their busy hum drowned the laborious effort of the giant. Thus the work, and still the crowd began to thicken. All waited the President's coming, but they were doomed to disapointment. The hand pointed to four o'clock. It lacked but a few minutes of the hour. At thisement two engineers took their position near the lever of the engine, and their eye rested on the gong which was to notify them when to apply the subtle touch which should end the work of the machinery, and signal the Centennial. A moment later the silvery peal of the gong, touched by an invisible wire gave the word and in second the Corliss engine had ceased its operations and rested. This was the occasion for rapturous applause, oft repeated. A change had passed over Machinery Hall. The throbbings of the great leviathan had ceased, and with them the pulsations of all other machinery and the twenty-miles of shafting and forty odd miles of belting.

ITEMS.

"Come home, John, a rolling stone gathers no moss." "No I won't mother, a setting hen never grows fat."

Doctor—Only winged again! You won't get much of a bag to-day, Charlie. Charlie (nettled)—impossible to kill every time. I don't load with prescriptions.

A maiden lady said to her little nephew; "Now, Johnny, you go to bed early, and always do so, and you'll be rosy cheeked and handsome when you grow up." Johnny thought over this a few minutes, and then observed: "Well, aunty, you must have sat up a good deal when you were young."

An agent for the sale of some household article attempted to mount the steps of a house recently, but a dog came around the corner and took half a yard of cloth from the back of his coat. The man was sliding out when the owner of the house came and asked: "Did doze dog bide you?" "He didn't bite me, but he tuined my coat," was the reply. "My good friend, excuse doze dog if he didn't bite you. He ish a young dog now, but by and by he shall take holt of some agents and eat der bones ride out of them. He bides a coat now, but he shall soon do petter?"
