WOULD respectfully call public attention to the large and complete assortment of Rosewood and Mahogany PIANO-FORTES, which he is now offering for Sale at his WARE-ROOMS; they consist of the Harmonic, Grand Square and Cottage Style, six, six and-a-half, and seven Octaves, with Metallic Frames.

£100 REWARD.

WHEREAS some malicious person or persons have circulated a REPORT that SEVERAL HUNDRED CHESTS OF DAMAGED TEAS, and in their quality, and (from the effects of salt water) poisonous in their nature, lately sold in this City, were purchased by me, I hereby offer a REWARD of £100 to any person who will bring to conviction the author or authors of such a slander, as such report is false, malicious, untradesmanlike, and intended to injure my reputation.

It is well known that I and I alone have been the regenerator of the Tea and Coffee Trade in Canada, that mine (the Canton House) is the only establishment for the exclusive sale of Tea and Coffee in either the Upper or Lower Province, and, by my untiring exertions, has been placed in the proud position which it now holds, notwithstanding the immense amount of malicious opposition I had to encounter. It is also well known that I have never interfered with others; that I have never exposed the known fact of the utter impossibility of keeping Teas in a proper condition when turpentine, codfish, oil, soap, molasses, candles, snuff, tobacco, &c., &c., are kept; but when my good name is so cruelly and wantonly assailed, as in this case, I cannot overlook it, and have only to say, that should this calumnious slander be persisted in, the Public may have a list of the names of the purchasers of the Damaged Teas, above referred to, which is now in my possession, as I again repeat, no man shall sport with my hard-earned reputation with impunity.

The immense demand for the inestimable composition throughout the United States, has made it difficult for the Proprietor to keep up the supply; and the Agent feels confident that a few trials of it in this quarter of the Continent will afford such satisfactory results that the Sale will be permanently large.

It is sold in Bottles, with directions for use, price 2s 6d for each Bottle, at WM. McMASTER'S Cabinet Warehouse, No. 156, Notre Dame Street.

INDIAN JUSTICE;
OR,
THE CAYUGA'S REVENGE.

A Tale of the Last Century.

Shortly after the Declaration of the Independence of the United States, a surveyor's party plunged boldly into the depths of the primeval forest, bent on surveying and making out a new settlement. It boots not now to point out the precise spot. Sufficient for our purposes to locate it in the vicinity of Cayuga Lake. Strange as it may, and does, appear, they were inextricably lost, notwithstanding that there were several expert woodmen in the party. For several days they wandered about in their endeavors to extricate themselves, each succeeding day only making the confusion in their brains worse confounded. How often do we find the coolest heads in moments of difficulty lose their self-possession; there are times, when by an overpowering influence—one cannot call it fear, though gradually and unmistakeably it assumes that type—all our knowledge of past events, all our forethought of the future is one dim, hazy blank, which, by degrees, assume a darker cast, unless a master mind is there calmly and deliberately to rend the veil asunder, to restore the fast fading confidence, without which all human energy is nought.

'Tis passing strange how the mind of one man in times of darkness and dread, undismayed by danger, and uninfluenced by imminent peril, can so animate the mass that they would face greater danger than that which totally unmanned them scarce five minutes previously. There was a master with the party I commenced to tell you about, but the mind there was not; hence their total loss and consequent bewilderment.

Many of our readers may not have had the extreme felicity of losing themselves in the bush, and consequently cannot for a moment picture to their minds the sensations likely to be experienced there; there may be many again, who, without being absolutely lost, have fancied themselves so, the feeling being barely second to the reality. Old woodmen, though we be, this fancy in our hunting excursions has more than once crossed our mind, faintly and dubiously as it were, and ever have we found that, unless the bugbear was eradicated, there and then effectually, that a total shipwreck would infallibly be the result. In one particular instance, we especially recollect following for several hours fresing, (to which we attributed the disorder,) a deer in all manner of directions, till we gave up the chase, unable any longer, from want of snow, to track. The bush we were in we had traversed many a time; we knew that a N. E. course would bring us out from any part of it, somewhere near where we wanted to go, and yet when we did see about returning, our compass lied, the moss on the trees lied, everything lied but our fancies, which pointed out quite a contrary direction. We sat down to argue the point to bring reason to combat prejudice, and yet then every argument failed to convince the wandering mind. We had to walk back seven miles for letting the mind overcome reason. But even after that we have been sensible that it is not possible at all times to control the mind. We were nervous, irritable, and fancied ourselves half lost—why we cannot tell—and when we got out of the bush we were totally lost, for we did not recognize a building which we had seen for years, and yet we were not afraid in this particular instance, though in all probability in another hour's time we should have been that also.

If then at times vague fears will seize the mind, spite of better judgment, in an almost well-known abode, what, O! may we conceive of the wilderment of the party whose entrance into an unknown wild we chronicled some time back.—That this particular party were lost is evident from their having wandered about for several days, until at sun down one evening, with their provisions totally exhausted, they found themselves in sight of an Indian's wigwam on the shores of the beautiful Cayuga Lake, not then, as now, bordered by happy and thriving homesteads, but one unbroken mass of magnificent wood to the waters' edge. A human habitation to these ill-starved lost wanderers, was as grateful as the distant view of the Holy City to the pilgrims of old. Joyfully did they accept the Indian's proffered hospitality. The fish and venison prepared with rude inartistic skill, never tasted more delicious than now. All their troubles vanished in a moment, and after satisfying the cravings of their inordinate appetites, the head surveyor of the party, (whom we will now introduce to our readers, as a Mr. Shomberg, nowise extraordinary in his appearance, save a peculiar and at the same time disagreeable cast of countenance, which somehow conveyed to the beholder an impression that was unfavorable to the wearer; his character, however, belied his face; he was much esteemed and respected by all who knew him,) questioned the Indians as to their present position, and where they ought to have been. Strange as it may appear, they were within a few miles of where their labors were to commence, and one and all agreed that their late loss was extraordinary, inasmuch as they must have passed over the very ground they had been in search of.

While they were thus working up their reckoning and smoking their pipes, Shomberg cast his eyes on a superb looking heavy Tyrolese rifle standing in the corner of the wigwam. The rich plating and peculiar make of the weapon attracted his attention, particularly as being so mal-apropos to the owner. The Indian, however, soon relieved Shomberg's mind as to his having acquired possession of it, by stating that it was a present to him from an English officer, whose life he had saved during the late war, and who, to reward his preserver and show his gratitude, had presented him with the weapon which so excited Shomberg's curiosity. The execution, so said the Indian, far exceeded the beauty of the external workmanship, and his praises of his loved weapon were so extravagant, that Shomberg offered to buy it at a large price, provided such was the case.

"Me no sell him—but me show you," said the Indian, and 'twas determined that the much vaunted rifle should be tried in the morning, ere they started back. Various attempts did Shomberg make to come to terms—his own rifle, tobacco, powder, lead, money, in fact, every inducement to tempt an Indian to trade was used, but all in vain. Night found him no nearer the much coveted prize then did the morning. And so the party retired to rest; more correctly we should say, stretched themselves out to rest.

Morning found the whole party refreshed and ready to renew their march in search after the settlement. After a hearty breakfast, at Shomberg's request the Indian cut a small chip out of an oak some 150 yards from the wigwam. At this he fired, and the ball struck scarce an inch from the mark. Again he fired, and this time hit the mark. Shomberg now tried his hand, and was very successful, so much so, that of six shots fired, a circle of four inches would have covered the chip and all the bullet holes beside. Lead were all of them in praise of the weapon—none more so than Shomberg. Most liberally did he offer blankets, money, rum, tobacco, even spirits were added, with the hope of inducing the Indian to part with the weapon. All efforts were unavailing, the Indian most firmly refused every offer; he would not part with his rifle, so he said, but with his life. He had, it seems, taken charge of the English officer when desperately wounded, and had conceived a strong affection for him while tending to his wounds, and highly did he prize the present of his white brother.

Finding the Indian firm in his refusal, the party gathered together their instruments and arms, bestowed against the whole of their scanty stock of tobacco on their late entertainers, shouldered, and with every expression of good feeling they parted. An hour had scarcely passed when a man glided into the open space in front of the Indian's wigwam. In a sunny nook sat a decrepid, dried up old woman, fast tottering to the grave. Near at hand sat the Indian, repairing moccasins. Greatly to the Indian's surprise, he recognized the new Shomberg, who seated himself by the Indian's side, and commenced the tedious task of ascending the highly prized rifle. As well might he have attempted to move the rock of Gibraltar as the stern resolve of the warrior. He saw it was useless, but yet he was bent upon his purpose. Suddenly his face lit up with a most demoniacal expression, as if some unholy purpose had flitted across his mind.

After a while, he asked to see another trial, to which the Indian assented. Again the tree was blazed, again the rifle sent forth its unerring bullet. Shomberg coolly and deliberately walked away with the piece for which he had not scrupled to shed the blood of his late host. He joined the party, triumphantly displaying the prize, for which he told them that he had paid the Indian most handsomely.

The party soon found the place, and finished their survey, and returned to their homes. Shomberg, in high spirits at his successful exploit, bent his steps to New York, where he at that time resided—without a care or a thought of the poor being he had so unscrupulously deprived of life.

Let us turn back for a moment to the scene of bloodshed and murder. As soon as the retreating footsteps of the intruder were no longer audible, the old crone, unable to walk, commenced to crawl towards the body of her fallen son. Slowly and painfully did she drag her weary way, fearful lest her long coming might prove fatal. Who can express the hope or fear that possessed that poor, forlorn, miserable cripple! No fear for herself, her lonely and melancholy condition, for a moment entered her mind; her whole thoughts were in the senseless and inanimate form that lay now but a little distance from her. At last she reached the body, tears aside with frantic energy the shirt; there, right over the heart, is a small hole, from which the blood is scarcely welling out. The vital spark, however, had long since fled; no mortal power can animate that senseless mass of clay. Full well at a glance does the old squaw know this. This is not the first mortal wound she has inspected. Louder and louder does she raise her voice, the cry of vengeance far superior to that of grief. But yet she is helpless; none of her tribe are near to respond to her cries, or to perform the last and rites to the victim.

Of this, she at last seems aware, and gradually her wail becomes more sorrowful as nature is exhausted. She, however, still retains her post by the dead body, and all that eve and night does she watch over it, fasting alone. Sleep at last she does, despite her efforts to the contrary, gradually falling over the dead man; and in that situation she was discovered in the afternoon by a young hunter who chanced that way. He soon sees the blood, and approaches, as he fancies, the dead bodies. Judge his surprise when he finds one warm. By dint of shaking he wakens the old woman, and learns from her what has occurred. Carefully does he remove the body into the hut, and, assisting the old squaw and supplying her with food, he hastens away from the spot.

The daylight was just breaking when the Indian again made his appearance, accompanied by some eight others. Again the body was inspected, the old squaw was questioned, and the appearance of the murderer so impressed on their minds, that one and all were satisfied they could recognise him without trouble. His footsteps, however, were examined and noted. The Indian was consigned to his lonely hut, the party separated, and, to the appearances, the affair was ended.

Not so, however, was the case. The Indian who first discovered the deed had silently followed the trail to where the survey had been made, and then to the nearest settlement, where, in his broken English, he managed to gain information that the head of the party had gone to New York, and that he had a rifle along with him, purchased from an Indian, and that his name was Shomberg. With this information, he rejoined his tribe.

In less than a week after, various parties of strange Indians were noticed in the streets of New York. Who they were, whence they came, or why, none could tell. Their faces were painted black—all were fully armed, and might be seen, day by day, prowling, now in detached parties, now singly, through the streets.

At length, Shomberg was seen, instantly recognized, and followed. His residence discovered; day by day, and night by night, a red skin might be seen either watching his residence, or dogging his steps. Twice did they attempt his life, but were foiled each time. Shomberg, however, saw enough to satisfy him that he was "doomed." For several days he did not stir out; but still from his window he could always see an Indian somewhere.

His life grew burthensome. He resolved to leave the country; but instead of sailing from New York, he was obliged to go to Montreal. Taking the precaution to find a party bound to the same place, he set sail for Lake Champlain, successfully avoiding the Indians, as he thought.

Such, however, was not the case. The foe were on his track; their light canoes were
