PICTURES FROM BARNA, IRELAND.

WHAT AN EMGLISH VISITOR SAW.

[Liverpool Times.]

Three representatives of the North of England miners are at present investigating the condition of the Irish agricultural population. They write their experience in the Newcastle Chronicle, and write them well. The letter, which appeared last Monday, signed by Mr. James Birkett was from Barna, near Galway. We cannot reproduce the communication in full, but a few extracts will suffice to give an idea of the discoveries the three gentlemen are making.

Barna is a collection of erections dispersed along the roadside for about half a mile. There are probably over fifty of these dwellings. They are, with three or four exceptions, built of stones thrown loosely on top of each other, with mud in the middle of the wall to hinder the wind from blowing through They have all at one time or another, been thatched, but in most cases the straw is now buried beneath a plentiful crop of weeds and low rank grass. They have all been built by the tenants themselves, and their ideas of house-building have been, it seems, quite rudimentry. I entered a dwelling standing near the road. The heads of the family were away inGalway. A girl,about nine years of age,was sitting on the floor, near the hearth, upon which were a couple of half burnt clods of turf that had expired. The girl was rocking a sort of box that answered for a cradle, and on a collection of rags in a corner, answering for a bed, laying a little fellow about three years old, sleeping calmly. There was nothing worthy the name of furniture in the house, and the earthen floor was a great deal more uneven than an ill kept country road. Yet this, as I afterward found, was one of the "good" houses of the village.

Then I came upon a sight which I shall never forget. I went up a rocky lane to two brokendown looking hovels which stood about fifty yards from the high road. One of them was about the size of an ordinary pig-stye. The door of the other was stuffed with stones and straw. At the gable of the latter place I met an old bent man, whose body was but half covered with dirty rags. He let me round the other side of "house," and showed the way through an aperture in the wall This opening which was the only means of ingress and egress, had no door upon it. It was really nothing more than a hole,roughly broken in the wall. The interior would be about 18 feet long 10 feet across. There was no fire on the hearth. The
