"My girlhood, the beautiful ignorance of life, has all gone now. It began to go as soon as I came home to live with you; but I wish—I wish—it had not gone—so wretchedly, so cruelly. Good night."

She spoke with difficulty, and he saw that she was deeply moved; and even after the rustle of her skirts had died away in the hall above he stood looking after her, and listening and wondering. Then he opened a bundle of papers containing his computations and bent over them in deep absorption.

"She will sign it; she will sign it," he repeated, though he did not raise his head.

When 12 o'clock struck he went to the front doorstep and looked up through the boughs of the cedars to the great host of stars. He gazed long, muttering as though at prayer, while the night wind blew upon him until he was chilled.

"The frost, the frost, it will cut it down, the corn, the corn, the beautiful corn! But it is too late, too late!"

He went in and closed the door, muttering, "The corn! the corn!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

In Seminary Square.

At midnight Leighton sat in the old house in Seminary Square debating the situation with Rodney Merriam.

"What we said to her here this afternoon evidently failed to arouse her. She either doesn't understand, or she doesn't care."

"She understands perfectly," said Merriam; "but it's quite like her to wish to shield him. Her mother did it before her. It's a shame for the money to have gone so; but it was inevitable, and I'm glad it's over now."

"If it is over—something might be saved for her."

"We'll let it all go. She'd better be a beggar than have her father published as a felon. Whatever I have shall be hers; and there's my sister, with no one else to care for. The dread of her father's doing something to disgrace her and all of us has hung over me all the year; I'm glad we've reached a crisis. She is like her mother; yes; she is like Margaret. Ah, Morris! it seems to me that I have seen nothing but failure in this world."

Morris was silent. Rodney Merriam was growing old and the thought of it touched him deeply, for Rodney Merriam was his best friend, a comrade, an elder brother, who stood to him for manliness and courage, much as Carr represented in his eyes scholarship and professional attainment.

"You never saw Zelda's mother?" asked Merriam, presently.

"No."

"You never knew anything of her life?"

"No," said Leighton. The old man's head was bent and he did not look at Leighton; but the young man saw that he was moved by some memory.

"Your father and my sister were once engaged to be married," said Merriam, still not looking up. He was silent for an interval.

"I never knew," said Leighton. "I never had the slightest idea of it."

"I knew you did not know; and Zee does not know, and she mustn't know. It's too bad, Morris, that we can't order our lives as they should be. Mine is a failure. I am 60 years old; and I am not only a failure, but the people I have tried to help I have injured." He spoke bitterly.

"No, no; you must not talk so. If you have done half as much for any one else as for me—"

"I have done nothing for you—or for Zee, and I have tried to help her. I have wanted—I have wanted very much for you to care for each other. It's like an echo of an old story. All that I ask now is that you will bear me no ill will when I have gone. I have done the best I could."

"Please don't! There's no reason why you shouldn't stay in the world for many years to come."

"We don't say 'many years' when we have passed 60. Your father was my intimate friend, Morris. We were boys together at college—it's your college and mine, too. I'm glad you went there. Your father would have liked it so. Some of the fellows who taught us, taught you. When you saw them you saw gentlemen and scholars. They gave up the chance of greater things to stay there among the elms and maples of the old campus. God never made finer gentlemen!

"Your father and I were seniors at Tippecanoe when the civil war came. Your father rose from the ranks to be a colonel. My own affairs didn't prosper; but that's all over now," and the old man sighed. "After the war it didn't seem worth while to go back to school, but your father finished and stayed there in Tippecanoe where he was born, and studied law. I tried the law here, but it wouldn't go; the war had spoiled me—I failed there, as everywhere. My father died and left me enough to live on, and a little more; so I've never done a single thing to my credit from beginning to end."

He was speaking brokenly, in a way that was new to him. He felt helplessly about on the table for the safety match holder, and Leighton sprang up and handed him a light—something that he had never before felt that he dare do. No one ever held Rodney Merriam's coat for him, any more than one patted him on the back.

"At the end of our war, the Maximilian affair was on in Mexico and I wanted to have a hand in it. When I came back your father had moved here. He was an ambitious man. There was every likelihood of his taking a high place at the bar; and he had, too, a taste for politics. He could hardly have failed to receive substantial rewards, for everything went to the soldiers in those days. Then he met my sister. She was the youngest member of our family—only a girl at the end of the war. She was a very beautiful woman, Morris. She and Zee are much alike; but Zee has marked traits of her own. I don't quite account for them. Her mother was a quick-witted woman, well educated for her day. Zee is more a woman of the world than her mother was and she has more spirit."

Merriam opened a drawer in his table and drew out a miniature painted on porcelain. He put on his spectacles and studied it intently for a moment before handing it to Leighton.

"The old-fashioned way of wearing the hair make a difference; but to all intents and purposes his is Zee. As Margaret was our youngest, we had a little different feeling about her. I had—I was the oldest—and the rest of them had. She had known no trouble; she was light of heart—the brightest and cheeriest girl in town; and there seemed no reason why she should not marry happily and never know care or trouble. It was understood in the family that they were to be married, though there was never any formal announcement. Your father meanwhile was establishing himself. Then Margaret went east to visit a friend of hers. That was 30 years ago. I was going to Washington to appear before an army board that was investigating some claims that grew out of the war, and I went with her and left her in New York. We made a fine lark of the trip. When I left her with her friends I said, 'Don't forget Morris; he's back there working for you.'

"My errand in Washington kept me longer than I expected. Margaret went home alone finally, and when I got back, a little later, I found that it was all off between her and your father. The girl had never been away from home before, and the people she visited put her through lively paces. It was easy to admire her, and the admiration from strangers went to her head. Mariona wasn't very gay in those days, and Margaret had missed a good deal of the social life that she was entitled to."

The old man paused, lost in thought, and Morris was glad of the silence. He was trying to construct for himself the past—to see his father as Rodney Merriam had painted him, and to see, too, Margaret Merriam as she had been when his father knew and loved her.

Merriam was feeling about for matches—a sign that he was ready to resume; and Morris again struck a light for him.

"There's no use going into it. She stopped writing to your father without any warning that she had changed. She was completely carried away with the excitement of her New York experiences. Morris came to Washington and asked me what to do, and I sent him to New York to see her and fix it up; but it did no good. She was not ready to settle down yet a while, she told him. I supposed it would all come right, for I had faith in her. She was a true-hearted, gentle woman, but she was proud and headstrong; and your father had his pride, too. I don't blame him for taking it hard. He closed his office here and went back to Tippecanoe. I don't believe they ever saw each other again. When she came home she was her old self; she had been having her fling, and she didn't understand that the same glamour hadn't blinded all of us.

"She really expected your father to meet her on the old footing. She had cared for him a great deal, and it was the first great shock of her life to find that a man whose heart she had trifled with did not seek her again when she was ready for him. But it had cut into him deep; your father took things hard. It was temperamental, I suppose. I was a loser, too, in all this. I lost the first and best friend I ever had. I rarely saw him after that. He stayed close to the old college town. He made himself its best lawyer. He was sent to the Legislature and Congress. He went just so far in politics and then stopped. I always had an idea that he was merely testing his powers. He wanted to see what he could do; and finding that he could make it go, he decided that it wasn't worth the candle."

DIAMOND DYES

Each year thousands of letters come in from all parts of this vast Dominion telling of victories and successes with Diamond Dyes in the home.

The marvelous and immense sales of Diamond Dyes in Canada have induced adventurers and speculators (who know nothing about the chemistry of colors) to go into the putting up of Package dyes. Such dyes are adulterated and crude; the colors are muddy and blotchy, bringing ruin to the materials you try to dye.

Diamond Dyes, the choice of wise women, are the kind used when bright, full, fast and brilliant colors are wanted. No disappointments possible when you use Diamond Dyes.

Diamond Dyes are sold by all leading druggists and dealers. Refuse to accept substitutes when you ask for Diamond Dyes. 57-k-y

BERLIN LEFT FIELD IN DISGUST; DIDN'T LIKE UMPIRE'S DECISION

Senior W. F. A. Football Championship Goes to Seaforth by Narrow Margin.

Berlin, Ont., July 10.—The Seaforth team are the senior football champions of the W. F. A., having won by a margin of one goal. Berlin lost to Seaforth by a score of 3 to 1 last Friday, and tonight's match was the final, which Berlin won by a score of 3 to 2.

The game tonight ended very unsatisfactorily. About five minutes before time was up Seaforth scored on an offside, which the referee allowed without questioning the goal umpire, who claims with hundreds of spectators that it was clearly an offside. W. F. A. Secretary Harry Brown, who was present, saw the offside play.

The players disputed the goal and the spectators rushed on the field and added to the mix-up. Sticks and canes were freely used and a general powwow ensued.

Referee J. W. Ward, of Stratford, stuck to his decision as to the goal, and the Berlin players walked off the field in defense of their rights.

The game was up to the time of the mix-up as good a game as has been played here for some time, and with fair play Berlin would have tied them and probably won out.

As a man Mr. Ward is a gentleman, but as a referee he does not qualify, as some of his decisions at this game were off color. Five hundred people witnessed the game.

THE DILLON-DELMAR RACE AT DETROIT

The public will certainly witness the greatest performance that ever took place in Michigan, when Lou Dillon and Major Delmar will meet at Detroit during the week of July 24-28 for a gold cup offered by the Detroit Driving Club. It would astonish no one familiar with the speed of both horses should a world's record result from this race.

Lou Dillon has spent the winter in the climate of her birth, California, and has been under the skillful eye of America's leading light harness horse trainer, Budd Dobie, maker of champions, who sent her back east recently in the best condition possible for man to get her. Doble also remarked that "Queen Lou" was, in his opinion, the greatest mare he had ever handled, a high compliment, when it is recalled that Doble raced Goldsmith Maid. By his easy defeat of Lou Dillon last fall, Major Delmar won many admirers, who were previous to that solid for Lou.

Alta McDonald, who has always handled Major until this year, is of the opinion that no horse standing on iron today, or ever did, is high class enough to be compared with the champion gelding.

Charles (Doc) Tanner, who handles Major these days, is authority that he has more speed this year than ever.

Both horses are fit and ready for the task of their life. A great race, in face the greatest, should be the outcome of this meeting. Possibly never again will they meet, and to see the only two-minute trotters in the world race against each other is the occasion of a lifetime.

OLDFIELD MAKES FIVE MILES IN 5:08 4-5

St. Paul, Minn., July 10.—The final heats in the automobile races, the preliminaries of which were run on Saturday, were completed on the Hamlin's track this afternoon. The weather and track conditions were ideal and there was a large attendance.

In the final tri-city championship, five miles, Earl Kiser won; Chevrolet, second. Time, 4:58½.

In the handicap race for touring cars carrying three passengers, Louis Hill won, Barney Oldfield second. Time, 7:08½.

A breakdown spoiled the contest between Barney Oldfield and Louis Chevrolet in the special five-mile event. For two miles the race was exceedingly close, Oldfield appearing from the stand to lead by not more than a few yards. Chevrolet broke down on the third mile while rounding the home stretch, going at a tremendous clip, and Oldfield finished alone in 5:08 4-5.

REMARKABLE EARL

He of Leicester Has Many and Varyl g Claims to Fame.

London, July 10.—Though he was born over 84 years ago, one of the least of the claims to distinction of the venerable Earl of Leicester, who is now seriously ill, is that he is numbered among the patriarchs of the British peerage. He is in many ways absolutely unique among English nobles. He has been the father of eighteen children, of whom fourteen survive, and he numbers among his sons-in-law four earls, a viscount and a baron. There is a difference in age of close on half a century between his eldest daughter, Lady Powerscourt, and his youngest son. He is at once a great-grandfather several times over and the proud father of a boy of eleven. Perhaps, however, the most astonishing thing about the earl's family history is the fact that he married his second wife, the present countess, exactly 100 years after his father married his first. Lord Ronald Gower once mentioned the amazing fact to Queen Victoria, who was pretty well posted on the family history of the peerage, but it so staggered her that she refused to believe it without documentary proof.

The Earl of Leicester is a notable example of the good results of the simple life—the real simple life; that is, not that counterfeit of which self-approving votaries write to the papers. When well, on any fine day he might be encountered on one of the fields of his estate, clad in a suit of rough tweeds, with gun on shoulder. A true sportsman, he believes in the sport that gives the game a chance—not that form of slaughter so popular among the British aristocracy in which an army of beaters drive the birds on the guns, or does he ever make sport an excuse for gorging. At lunch time he may be looked for under a hedge, munching bread and cheese and onions and washing it down with a draught of beer brewed in his own house. That menu is not altered even for the Prince of Wales when he goes shooting with the Earl of Leicester. He will not deviate from his simple habits or put on style, to please anybody.

Holkham Hall, where the veteran peer has spent most of his time in recent years, is a vast Palladian edifice of white stone, standing in a park as flat as a pancake, but diversified with some fine timber. He occupies the ground floor of his magnificent mansion and there are certain rules of the establishment to which everyone (royal visitors not excepted), has to conform. All under his roof are expected to be in bed by 11 o'clock, and bridge and kindred diversions are forbidden. The earl is a good landlord, an enthusiastic naturalist and a genuine philanthropist, with a penchant for church restoration, the cost of which he defrays out of his own pocket. In his own county, Norfolk, there are several which owe their preservation to him.

Vacation Is a Necessity.

All successful people take a vacation. To be successful you need a change from everyday occupation. A brief respite among the pines and woods, breathing in the pure air of the Highlands of Ontario, is nature's best tonic. There are so many delightful tours offered by the Grand Trunk that it is hard to enumerate, but they not only embrace Charming Muskoka, Lake of Bays, Georgian Bay, Kawartha Lakes, Temagami, the Magnetewan, French River, Lake Simcoe, but also delightful 6-days trips to Mackinaw Island through the 30,000 Island scenery, Duluth, Winnipeg, Portland, Oregon Exposition, and to the east, the always-delightful Thousand Islands and St. Lawrence tours, historic Quebec, White Mountains, and sea coast resorts, Portland, Old Orchard, St. John, N. B., Halifax, etc. A tourist folder, giving rates, etc., may be had for the asking at city ticket office, corner Richmond and Dundas streets, or by addressing J. D. SOME PERSONS have periodical attacks of Canadian cholera, dysentery or diarrhea, and have to use great precautions to avoid the disease. Change of water, cooking and green fruit is sure to bring on the attacks. To such persons we would recommend Dr. J. D. Kellogg's Dysentery Cordial as being the best medicine in the market for all summer complaints. If a few drops are taken in water when the symptoms are noticed, no further trouble will be experienced.

One of the developments of Glasgow's municipal street car system is providing private early morning cars for bringing home dance parties. A car requisitioned for such a purpose comes at any required hour to the point nearest the place where the dancers to be being held and takes the dancers to any desired points on the road.

How Red Rose Tea is Grown

TEA is a native plant of Northern India. Transplanted to Ceylon it lost much of its strength and richness, but gained in fragrance and delicacy.

That is why Ceylon tea is not a strong tea.

That is why I blend Indian and Ceylon teas together—that is how the strength and richness, fragrance and delicacy of Red Rose Tea are secured—that is why Red Rose Tea has that "rich fruity flavor."

Red Rose Tea is good Tea
