FATED TO LOVE HER

A moment later up jumped Cissy, darted like a flash of lightning across the room, and, holding the door open, marshaled him out, with the air of an offended queen. Out he went—but drew her after him, clasping her wrist so firmly that she could not have escaped without a struggle, which, for Gabrielle's sake, she forewent, and in a highly dignified manner allowed herself to follow in his train.

Then, setting her back against the closed door, she regarded him with a stony stare, and inquired what he wanted.

"Tell me at once, if you please, and be quick about it. I must go back to Gabrielle."

"Cissy, what is the matter woth Gabrielle?"

"Oh! Is that all? You would like to know, I dare say; you were always inquisitive. But I shan't tell you. So leave my wrist alone."

"Cissy, I must know."

"Must, indeed! Are you Mr. Godfrey, that you should come in this lofty manner, and demand to hear Gabrielle's secrets? And all this time she may be fainting! Do get away to The Featherstone, James! how can you be so ungentlemanlike? Let me go, I say."

And Cissy, wrenching her wrist free—a matter of little difficulty, for James perceived that he should gain nothing by detaining it—rushed back into the school-room, taking the precaution to lock the door behind her.

Gabrielle was quiet now, the tears had ceased. "Oh, did he see?" she asked, languidly, as Cissy resumed her place.

"Yes, he did; and serve him right!" muttered Cissy, under her breath.

"Never mind, darling," she said aloud; "don't trouble yourself about him."

"But did he see?"

"Well, of course, he saw," replied Cissy, coaxingly, "but what then. He could not know——"

Here she stopped; feeling that, to use a vulgar expression, she was "putting her foot in it."

"What did he say?"

"Oh, dear! what dreadful pertinacity!" thought Cissy. "Say? Nothing much. Only asked what was the matter, and——"

"And?"

"Gabrielle, you are incorrogible. Well! he got into a desperate state, dragged me out of the room—just see my wrist!" said Cissy, in a parenthesis, displaying a very pretty white wrist, on which the faintest possible tinge of red was fast becoming visible—"and asked what was the matter with Gabrielle? said he must know, or some such nonsense, and glared like a tiger—or what is the creature? However, I told him there was no must in the case, and—etc., etc. Now, Gabrielle, go to sleep."

"What else did you tell him?"

"Oh, Gabrielle! Gabrielle! what shall I do? Well! if you will be obstinate—I inquired, which was unnecessary, for, of course, I knew, whether he were Mr. Godfrey!"

"Oh, Cissy! why did you say that? I wish you hadn't!"

But the wish was not very strong. And he had been "in a desperate state," had said that he "must know." He cared for her still, then, a little. Perhaps—oh, perhaps—some day, all might come right!

And as she lay back in her chair, resigning herself to her fatigue, there was more of peace in Gabrielle's heart than she had known for weeks.

"Now you must have some wine. I'll get some myself, from the housekeeper's room; that Wilcox mayn't see your eyes. Lie still. I shall be back in a moment."

Away flew Cissy. But she was not back in a moment, or in many moments. The housekeeper was upstairs, the wine was under lock and key, and a considerable delay ensued. And, meanwhile, Gabrielle, thoroughly exhausted, dropped asleep, the tears still wet upon her cheeks.

James was hanging about restlessly in the hall, pausing sometimes before a window, sometimes before a statue, but seeing nothing. He had been in a hurry when he entered the school room, and, in fact, his horse was at this moment waiting, saddled and bridled, at the foot of the steps. Both horse and hurry, however, were forgotten now.

Presently the suspense became intolerable. He returned to the school room, opened the door. Cissy was gone, Gabrielle asleep; he entered with hushed tread, walked to her side, and, half-sitting, half-leaning, on the table near her, gazed. And as he gazed his heart sank lower, lower. Upon her brow was the impress of suffering. Something in the fall of her eyelids spoke of utter weariness, something in the lines of her mouth, of that inward siekness which wears the life away. Suddenly she moved and spoke. He bent his head and caught the words:

"Never hereafter to wake or to weep—"

He recognized the quotation; yet he shuddered.

"So you are here? That's quite unnecessary," said Cissy's voice behind him. "I beg you'll go again—— Ah! I thought I should find her asleep."

"Cissy, how delicate Gabrielle looks!"

"Fearfully delicate," assented Cissy, with a thrill of vicious delight; "exactly as though she were going into consumption. And I believe she is."

He turned passionately upon her.

"What right have you to say that, and in such a flippant tone? Is it a thing to be talked of lightly? As if—"

He paused and bit his lip; his voice had failed.

At this moment, with a little sigh, Gabrielle awoke. James, taken unawares, had no time to turn away. She had read of a look like this which now met hers; she had never seen one before. She did not start or color; she only drank it in, as though she were dreaming. She forgot for the instant her own identity; forgot everything but those dark eyes and their depth of unutterable love.

Suddenly she remembered, blushed crimson, and rose from her chair.

"Cissy, I have been asleep, I think. I hardly knew where I was."

"No, you are tired. Sit down again."

It was James who spoke, his tone very gentle, very low.

She obeyed, she sat down, strangely happy. He poured out a glass of wine with his own hand; he bent and gave it to her.

"You will feel better when you have drunk this," he said. "Cissy take care of her."

And he was gone, as though he could trust himself no longer.

"When the night is darkest the dawn is nearest." Only a few minutes ago, how dark had Gabrielle's night appeared! And now, when she least expected it, light was come. Whether real dawn or merely a transitory ray, she did not know. But one thing she did know. One fact that look had revealed.

"He does love me," she said to herself, as she sank back among the cushions. "I can't understand it. I can't tell why he is like this. But he does love me."

The bitterest drop in her cup of trouble had passed.

And James?

James had taken refuge in the cold silence of the chapel. There, alone, save for the passionless monuments, the oaken angels, the saints on the stained windows, his agony might give itself vent.

"It cannot be that she loves me—has loved me all this time; that I have broken her heart—hers! And I have gone too far to recede! Oh, my God! Oh, my God!"

CHAPTER XX.

James, as he left the chapel, felt that he was degraded. He mounted his horse and rode slowly away, pondering this degradation. Every moment revealed to him his own conduct in a more despicable light. When he had fancied himself highest, grandest, he had been playing the part of a villain—of an egotistical villain. He had closed his eyes to Gabrielle and had opened them only to himself. His own aspirations, his own advancement, had formed his one idea.

But again he said within his heart that he had gone too far to recede. How would the world regard him if he turned his back on Miss Featherstone now, after attentions so public, so deliberate, as he had made it his business to pay her—attentions which she had encouraged, which, as all might see, had won her heart, or, James bitterly thought the thing that answered for her heart? How would such conduct appear to her family, to her friends? How, indeed, to Gabrielle? Was it probable that Gabrielle would allow herself to be cast off or taken up at his pleasure? Of course, she could not penetrate his motives. To her he must simply seem a heartless, selfish flirt; a slave to mere beauty, too—nay, even a hypocrite! For he remembered conversations which had unfolded to her the santuary of his inner life, which had revealed to her his highest aims, his most ambitious dreams. How, in her sight, did his practice and his theory accord? And, low as he had doubtless already sunk in her estimation, would not if, to return to her, he forsook Miss Featherstone, sink even lower? Would she not scorn and spurn him as—well, perhaps, as he deserved?

Or, supposing every obstacle removed—supposing that she did receive him, and he made her his wife—would not this bring him to the very point which, to avoid, he had brought so much misery upon himself and, as he feared, upon her? For if, when he scarcely spoke to her from day to day—when their fellowship was chiefly confined to meals at the same table, to a sojourn under the same roof—he yet from day to day loved her more, felt her grow deeper into his heart; if this were the case now, how would it be were they united in the closest of all ties—were she, in the sight of God and man, his own, to love and cherish, as a duty, till death? Such a state of things could not—no, could not—exist without absorbing his whole heart and soul and mind; without, as he had dreaded, subordinating his intellect to his affections. And then he would have to own himself beaten—his own master never more!

Yet, if she loved him—if he had made her love him! And so the storm began afresh, and the same conflicting questions repeated themselves in a ceaseless round, until all was perplexed together, and only one definite idea remained. On the following day Charlie Godfrey was expected. Olivia anticipated great results from his visit. It might be that Olivia was right, and that all indecision would thus be set to rest. It might be. James believed that he hoped it. He determined, anyway, to wait and see.

Later the same afternoon, in turning over a packet of papers, he came upon a leaf torn from an exercise book, and covered with his own handwriting, as it had been at the age of eighteen.

A True Philosopher.

A true philosopher will not suffer himself to be greatly depressed or elated; excessive joy, grief, expectation, desire, being equally incompatible with the calm dignity which he will make it his first effort to att. in. He will therefore love nothing so much as to be unable to resign it with composure. He will hate nothing so much as in any degree to bias his sense of justice. He will shrink from no pain, no self-denial, which may assist him in the ultimate achievement of good. And the term "good" he will not, with the majority of men, understand to mean pleasure, or happiness; but that state of circumstances which is most favorable to the highest development of his nature.

He will preserve a rigid watch over the lower faculties, over the appetites and affections—both alike dangerous to one who would maintain a due equilibrium in all things. He will guard against any emotion that might lead him to depend upon the support which may fail, the favor which may change, the advice which may misguide, of a fellow-creature. In short, he will endeavor more and more to be sufficient for himself. Thus no alteration in the things or persons around him will have power to impair his serenity; and he will gradually acquire a loftiness of soul, a fixedness of purpose, a firmness of resolution, which will endow him with an almost unlimited control over the spirits of inferior men.

The highest state of humanity, my unalterable conviction.

J. F. G., Eton, May, 18—.

Did it occur to James that this sketch of his, these notions of "the highest state of humanity," might just as well have been written by some ancient pagan of Greece or Rome? Perhaps it did. Perhaps, as he stood looking over the park, the paper in his hand, some faint glimmer of light shadowed forth to him mountain peaks, which, exalted as was his standard, left that standard far behind. But the glimmer died away. James laid down the paper with a sigh. He had fallen many steps backward, he thought, since the days when he was a boy.

Charlie Godfrey arrived at the appointed time, and Gabrielle, when she met his sunshiny smile and felt her hand pressed warmly in his brotherly grasp, forgot for the moment all her troubles. Of course, Olivia contrived that he should take her in to dinner, and she would have been almost happy, she thought, as she sat there by his side, but for the consciousness of frequent and, she fancied, anxious glances thrown in their direction by James. And after each glance he was thoughtful, silent. He seemed unhappy, harassed, worn. Oh, how puzzling it all was! If she could only, though but for one instant, look into his mind!

She would have beheld a strange confusion! Deeper and deeper became his perplexity, fiercer his conflict, throughout each day of Charlie Godfrey's visit. In spite of all that he had endeavored to wish and hope on the subject, he left, as he saw them together, that should he ever see them as husband and wife, the spectacle would drive him mad. He was driven half mad already by the affectionate smiles which Gabrielle to often bestowed on this 'true knight" of hers; by the brightness which shone out on the wan, young face whenever he approached; by the eager tete-a-tete conversations in retired corners— conversations in which topics seemed never to fail or interest to flag.

COOL SURGEONS.

THEY USED THE KNIFE WHILE THE ROOF BLAZED.

Remarkable Illustration in the Protestant Hospital at Ottawa—Fire Was Fortunately Discovered Early and None of the Patients Were Hurt.

Ottawa, April 21.—Fire in the roof of the Protestant Hospital on Sparks street at noon to-day did damage to the extent of about six hundred dollars, and was attended by considerable excitement, both at the hospital and among the citizens generally, who soon learned where the fire was. Fortunately the presence of mind of the lady superintendent, house surgeons and nurses and the effect of the systematic fire drills which are in vogue in the institution prevented anything like a panic, and it is not thought that the condition of any of the patients will be seriously affected.

The fire was discovered by a charwoman in the attic, and she immediately gave the alarm, which was sounded through the hospital and turned into the fire department. In an instant the house surgeons and nurses responded. The house surgeons sprang to the hose, and soon had a stream playing on the fire from the inside. They prevented the fire spreading till the department arrived.

At the time the alarm was given an operation was in progress, and though those in charge of it were notified they continued just as if nothing was wrong and finished the operation without any excitement.

None of the patients had to be moved from the building, although they were hastily transferred from the wing of the hospital in which the fire was.

STOCK FRAUD.

Got Fifteen Months for Fraudulent Use of Mails.

New York, April 21.—Thomas O'Connor and his wife, Frances O'Connor, also known as Frances McLean, were found guilty before a jury in U. S. circuit court to-day on two counts of an indictment charging them with using the mails to defraud. Judge Holt sentenced O'Connor to 15 months in Clinton prison and suspended sentence on Mrs. O'Connor.

The O'Connors were charged with sending circulars through out the country by mail saying that they had inside information on the stock market and could so advise clients that they could not fail to reap big profits in speculations made on their suggestions. Mrs. O'Connor, under the name of Frances McLean posed as the possessor of the "inside information."

BEAT FATHER TO DEATH.

The Result of a Drunken Quarrel Among Indians.

Vancouver, B. C., April 21.—An Indian was brought down from Smith's Inlet, a hundred and eighty miles up the coast, and committed to New Westminster jail on a murder charge. The preliminary hearing at Alert Bay shows that the accused, a youth of twenty-one, quarrelled with his father, both being drunk. The accused went into a hut, found his father lying down, and beat him so severely that he died in a few days.
