said if a man was insensible to the pain of having his hair pulled he would also feel cold in his hand.

To the court—People in depressed condition frequently feel they are going insane and talk about it. The fact that a man's parents and relatives were insane might affect him detrimentally when he was depressed.

To Juror Armstrong—Erysipelas in the foot extending to the side might produce insanity in the same way as any form of ill health. The doctor drew a distinction between delirium that might have been produced through ill health and mania.

To the solicitor-general—It would be difficult to tell what conception of right or wrong Crawford had when he stood at the head of the stairs and threatened those who went up stairs.

Arhur Hines, called by the crown, worked with Crawford about a month ago at Randolph & Baker's mill. He said Crawford was an easy-going man, but there was nothing about him to excite suspicions as to his sanity. He was quiet.

Justus Cheeseman worked for a few days at Randolph & Baker's mill with the prisoner, but did not see anything to excite suspicion as to his sanity. Crawford was a quiet, easy-going man.

This concluded the testimony and the solicitor-general at once read over the sections of the criminal code relating to the disposal of persons who are found to have committed crimes while insane, and contended that though a man was insane he must be held responsible if it was shown he could distinguish between right and wrong as regards the crime he had committed.

At 10.45 o'clock Mr. Currey began his address. The case, he said, was one of the most unpleasant he had ever been connected with, because nearly all the family had been called upon to give evidence. Whether the crime was wilful murder or the act of an insane man it was equally sad, for a life had been taken and it was beyond dispute that the prisoner had taken it. From all the evidence it was for them to say whether or not the act was that of an insane man. If they found an absence of motive it was an evidence of insanity. Some attempt had been made to show that Crawford was feigning insanity, but he did not believe the jury would have any difficulty in making up their minds on that score.

Mr. Currey then read from Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence showing the symptoms and characteristics of insane persons. The relations of Brantom to the Crawford household were next pointed out. The evidence showed that they were of the most cordial character. Brantom was a prospective son-in-law with Mr. Crawford's own consent. Was it reasonable, he asked, to believe that Crawford was feigning insanity all through the summer, although he had only known Brantom for three months. Continuing, Mr. Currey recounted all the strange things the different members of the Crawford family had told of him, and said they were undoubtedly the acts of an insane man, and could not be accounted for on any rational basis. They covered a long period, and in considering them it should be remembered they were committed in the presence of his family and not before other people, which would have been the case had he been feigning insanity. Crawford's jealousy of his wife was an evidence of his insanity, because it was unnatural that a young man like Brantom, soon to be married to the daughter, would have improper relations with the mother. All the other witnesses declared that there was not the slightest ground for suspicion. Crawford's statement that he saw Brantom up stairs was a hallucination. The fact that there was insanity in the prisoner's family on both sides was a strong ground for believing that he also was insane. Crawford's father had died insane, while his mother is at present insane, and other relatives have been insane and some of them are at present in the asylum. This was pretty strong ground for believing Crawford's insanity was hereditary. It should also be remembered that Dr. Gray, who had known Crawford from childhood and who had treated him on several occasions, considered him insane. The doctor had said that as a boy Crawford was weak-minded and the sport of his companions. The evidence of Dr. Steeves was not entitled to as much weight because he had not had the opportunities to see the patient that Dr. Gray had. He did not ask the jury to say that Crawford did not commit the murder, for unfortunately he did, but he asked them to find that he was not guilty because he was insane when he did commit it. If they did that the law directed what should result.

Solicitor General White expressed regret that it had not been possible to conclude the case in one day, but it was so important that he felt it justified a searching and minute examination. It had been his aim to elicit all the facts, and that had been somewhat difficult from the fact that no preliminary examination was held. He had not tried to conceal anything that would tell for or against the prisoner, and he believed that everything possible had been brought out. The defence had presented all that told for the prisoner, and it was now his duty to point out what seemed to be against him. Whether insanity is real or feigned is a difficult thing to determine, and it must be remembered that insanity was frequently feigned by criminals in connection with a premeditated crime, because it was so easy. Therefore such a defence should be most searchingly investigated. If there was any doubt the prisoner should have the benefit of it. The position of the family in giving evidence was a trying one and he did not want to speak harshly of their evidence, but it was perfectly natural that they should desire to believe the father was not in his right mind when he committed the act. It was also natural that they should desire the public to so believe. He would not say they had sworn falsely, but it should be considered how much acts of the prisoner which at the time of their occurrence attracted little attention were swelled into importance under a desire to make them fit the idea of insanity. It seemed strange to him that if these acts of Crawford's so excited suspicion they were not told to Dr. Gray when he was called in to attend him. Crawford's belief that Brantom was intimate with Mrs. Crawford was not a passing delusion but a suspicion that was known to have existed for at least a fortnight before Brantom was killed. The solicitor-general himself expressed the belief that the suspicion was unfounded but as strongly as possibe pointed out that Crawford entertained it for a considerable period. It was also strange that the overt acts indicating insanity only came after Crawford's talk with Arbo when the latter had told him he must be insane. It was right that in this connection the idea of feigned insanity should be carefully considered. Crawford had told Arbo that bloodshed would result and what was more natural than that a man considering such a crime should feign insanity? Continuing, the solicitor-general pointed out that the prisoner's actions at the time he stood at the head of the stairs brandishing the club, had excited Dr. Gray's suspicions that he was insane. His other actions were not sufficient to make the doctor conclude he was insane until he considered the hereditary predilections. It was perfectly natural for a man feigning insanity to act as Crawford had before Dr. Gray. The manner in which the prisoner had entered the court house and his conduct in the witness box all looked like acting. It was noticeable that he had paid careful attention when his wife gave evidence although he had seemed indifferent to the testimony of the other witnesses. Dr. Steeves' opinion that the prisoner was shamming and the fact that his actions had excited the suspicions of Dr. Gray, were good grounds for considering whether or not the insanity was feigned. He was sure they would give the evidence the fullest consideration regardless of all feelings of sympathy. Touching on the question of hereditary insanity he pointed out that it was years after the birth of the prisoner before the mother became insane, while there was ground for believing that Crawford's father became insane while suffering with erysipelas in his head. This, he contended, did not make out a very strong claim for hereditary insanity. If the verdict was one of acquittal it must be because of the prisoner's insanity.

Judge Hanington, in opening his charge to the jury, expressed satisfaction that Dr. Steeves had been called. That Brantom had been killed by the prisoner without justification there was no doubt. Had not the evidence of insanity been given it would have been their duty to find the prisoner guilty of murder. The onus of proving the prisoner insane was on his counsel. The benefit of any doubt on that score should be given to the prisoner, for it was better that ninety and nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. If they found that in committing the act Crawford was capable of appreciating its nature and quality and knew it was wrong, then he should be punished. If they found him not guilty they must be satisfied that he did not know the wrong he had done. Judge Hanington read the law bearing on this subject. If they could see that there was a real motive it would materially help them in arriving at a conclusion. It is true the prisoner a week before the murder had a suspicion that Brantom was intimate with his wife, but he had himself admitted that it was unfounded. Some things that happened on the morning of the murder indicated that Crawford was sane, but there were other things which the prisoner had done that were not the acts of a sane man. It was clear that his family treated him as insane, and it did not seem that his overt acts were those of a sane man feigning insanity. The doctor himself had considered him temporarily weak and gave him a sedative. It would have been better had he been locked up, but on that score he found no fault with the doctor. The question of heredity he considered of very great importance. He would not say that Crawford was not feigning, but from the medical evidence it seemed it would not have been inconsistent for him to have had such a violent outbreak. If they thought him incapable of discriminating between right and wrong they should bring in not guilty, but if he was only shamming they should find him guilty. All reasonable doubt should be given. Judge Hanington asked the jury if they found Crawford not guilty to answer this question:

Do you find that at the time he killed John Henry Brantom Guilford Crawford was insane, and do you acquit him on that ground?

It was twelve minutes to one when the jury filed out of the court room, and in less than five minutes they came back again. Through their foreman, J. F. Merritt, they announced that they found Crawford not guilty, because he was insane at the time of the murder.

As the jury entered the court room, Crawford, who was lying down in the prisoner's box, was aroused by one of the constables. He sat up and looked about with a vacant stare, apparently unconscious of the nature of the proceedings.

Judge Hanington thanked the jurymen for their attendance, and said he agreed with their verdict. He instructed that Crawford be taken back to jail until the pleasure of the governor is heard regarding the future disposal of him, which means that he will be sent to the lunatic asylum. While in jail his relatives, friends and counsel can see him on a written order from the sheriff.

WAS IT MURDER?

George Teare, of Lepreaux, arrived home on Sunday morning with the remains of his brother, William, who was found dead on the track in Maine last week. The funeral took place on Sunday afternoon and was largely attended. There is said to be a suspicion that the deceased met foul play, as it was shown at the inquest that there was a wound on his neck such as would be made by a sharp instrument, and it is also said that he had drawn $100 to send home, but no money or other valuables were found on his person.

The present coffee crop is the largest ever grown.
