MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Lillian Asked Madge For a Minute Description of the Woman.

Lillian's question opened a dark avenue of thought, the gates to which I had resolutely kept closed ever since my father's revelation to me of his identity. Queerly enough, the odd actions of the woman in the cafe had suggested no connection with my mother's tragedy, although at Lillian's words I wondered at my own blindness.

"Of course, that's it!" I exclaimed, then answered my friend's question. "My father told me a long time ago, when he first revealed his identity to me, that he hadn't seen that woman for twenty years, and did not know whether she were living or dead. It was the only time he ever referred to her, and I have no reason to think he has learned anything about her since, except——"

Is Lillian Right?

"Except for that night in the cafe?" Lillian finished the next sentence. "Depend upon it, Madge, that woman is the answer. From what you tell me, the sight of her was a complete surprise and shock to him. Your father is, of course, old, and much reduced in physical strength, mental vigor and power of will from what he used to be, but he's too much a man of the world to be so upset by the sight of any woman unless she had the power to make you suffer. You are the darling of his heart, the one person on earth whom he loves, and his love for you is adoration, nothing less. Because of his deep remorse for the suffering he caused your mother, his love for you, his wish to keep suffering away from you, might lead him into all sorts of absurd Quixotic actions, especially if he thought that the suffering were coming from the same source that caused your mother's unhappiness.

"No doubt he is buying her off, the most ridiculous scheme in the world when you consider the power he could wield if he wished it. With his affiliations, just a word from him of attempted blackmail on her part and she would be landed so deep in jail that she couldn't dig her way out in a hundred years. But he, no doubt, is so afraid that you might in some way get a hint of her that he is submitting to any extortion, perhaps even himself proposing to pay her for silence and exile from your vicinity."

She stopped and looked at me questioningly. I nodded my head in confirmation of her words.

"I am sure you are right," I said. "Everything about that incident in the cafe fits your theory perfectly. For instance, I bear a striking resemblance to my mother—at least, people have always told me so. And when that woman first saw me that night—I had my back turned toward her, so she saw my father first—her eyes showed horror as well as unmistakable recognition, though I am sure that I never saw her before."

"Exactly!" Lillian replied, and followed her assent with a question.

"In what cafe did you dine that night?"

I told her. She drew a tiny notebook from a pocket in her skirt, carefully wrote the information down.

"The date, day and hour?"

I gave them to her.

"Now," she said, looking up, "please exercise that marvelous memory a little. I want as minute and perfect a description of that woman and her escort as you can give me."

A Decision Made.

I sat back, closed my eyes for a moment, and summoned from the memory pictures in my brain the vision of the couple in the cafe. I found that I had observed them more closely than I had thought, for little details of their dress and appearance flashed out at me with photographic fidelity. When I opened my eyes I was ready to give my friend a description which made her nod emphatic approval when I had finished.

"If I only had that memory of yours!" she said enviously, then thoughtfully: "Can you locate the table at which they sat, and describe their waiter, without taking me down there?"

"I am sure I can." I answered, and proceeded to describe the section of the big cafe in which we had been seated upon that night. Lillian was familiar with the place, and after a few minutes professed herself satisfied.

"I have something to go on now," she said, "and it ought not to take very long to trace the lady. When I've marked the dotted line leading to her door I'll let you know, and we'll make her a little social call. I can summon to mind now at least fifty-seven distinct varieties of conversation I'd like to hand her."
