The Nugents of Carriconna

An Irish Story.

By Tighe Hopkins, author of "Twixt Love and Duty," "For Freedom," etc.

"Well, have ye much money left, Anthony?" asked Lady Frayne with a chuckle, as she subsided into the capacious wicker chair.

"Whips of it," said Anthony. "Sure I didn't begin to spend yet, at all. At present I'm just thinking about it. But I'll be able to show you something by-and-bye."

"Well, and what about your observatory? Haven't ye made a beginning there?"

"Just a bit of a start. But that's a mair trifle."

"Now, Sarah, don't be leading him on to talk in that foolish way," said Barbara. "The man's just prepared for any absurdity a person could think of, and it's restraining him his friends should be, and not encouraging him."

I don't know whether Anthony or Lady Frayne enjoyed this themore. Lady Frayne, accustomed to the penurious notions and meager ways of the old Anthony, the Anthony of days gone by, found a huge delight in exploiting him in his new character; and Anthony was always ready to be "drawn."

"I'm going to make me peace with Barbara," he said. "I'm going to plan a hen and turkey farm of her own for her, and give her Pope's powers over it. 'Tis then that she'll be aisy—easy, I should say—in her mind."

"And ye're taking great pains with your talk, too, I observe," said Lady Frayne. "Is it long since 'aisy' wasn't good enough for ye?"

"Mr. Nugent is getting ready for a great visit to Jupiter," interposed Dora.

"And how do we know but they have a fine brogue of their own in Jupiter," said Lady Frayne.

"But nobody lives in Jupiter at all," said Kitty, and was promptly pounced upon by Anthony.

"Who's after telling ye that?" said he.

"Awfully warm for them, I should think, if there are any fellows up there," said Trenchard.

But further discussion as to the habitability of Jupiter and its possible inhabitants was prevented by a sudden and almost startled exclamation from Kitty.

"Who in the world is that?" she cried as a figure approached in the near distance.

It was a man's figure of about Anthony's height, and well-shaped, in a seedy Norfolk jacket, sewn all over with pockets, and a pair of not less seedy knickerbockers. The stranger's face was a shade or two darker than the traditional walnut.

"It's Arthur! It's Arthur!" said Kitty again, now fairly screaming.

"If 'tis he, I'll never forgive ye, Kitty, for being the first to see him," answered Barbara, fetching out and hastily adjusting her glasses. "It is Arthur! the dear old boy. It's himself!"

It was Arthur's self indeed.

Kitty and Barbara both rushed to get him; an unequal race, and Kitty won it.

"Kitty! my Kitty!" and off the grand went her little ladyship's feet, and Dora and everybody else heard with great distinctness the kiss that followed. It was the first time that Arthur had kissed her in public. But it was also the first time he had returned home from Africa.

"And not a word to give us time to get ready for ye!" said Barbara, when turn came next, and she had certainly no reason to complain of her share of the salutations.

"Ready! What's to get ready, dear?" cried Arthur. "You're ready for me yourself, and that's enough. Why, your worship" (to his father), "you've been growing backwards, I declare—if you haven't bought a hair dye. I'm certain you were grayer when I went away. How are you, Lady Frayne? Hullo, Trenchard! Why, my dear," he said to Barbara, "if you'd sent out invitatians you couldn't have made a kinder show for me. Now, may I go in and eat?"

CHAPTER XV.

ONE TRAVELER RETURNS.

"Ye may eat the whole place out," said Barbara. "I daresay ye're famishing with hunger. I don't suppose now that ye've had a decent meal these two years. Give me another kiss, my boy. I'm just dazed with delight, I am. Come in now, come in."

And she carried the hero off to the house to be regaled on "the first decent meal he had had for two years."

Everybody was excited. Kitty could hardly contain herself, and not even the presence of Dora prevented her from showing her joy. To Dora, who was formally introduced to Arthur (though not as an inmate of the house—that was a surprise reserved for him), the scene had a comic interest of its own. Her cousin evidently supposed her to be of the Doyne Abbey party, some friend of Kitty or her mother, and Dora was picturing to herself the amazement with which he would receive the news that she was a member of the Carriconna household. Arthur had heard by letter from Barbara of the death of his Uncle Kedagh, and also that his father had inherited that uncle's fortune; but, as during Kedagh's lifetime, none of them had known what his wealth amounted to, Arthur had not been very vividly impressed by that intelligence.

"Great news I'll have for him. Great news indeed," said Anthony, rubbing his hands and chuckling to himself. "Now I wonder will Arthur be for turning astronomer too?"

"Oh! not he indeed," said Lady Frayne, "and he'll laugh you out of it before long, Anthony."

"Ye think that, do ye?" And I having but just sent off for me telescope. And I'll engage that when it comes Arthur will 'explore Africa' just as well sitting on the tower there as when he was in Africa itself. Don't you think he will, Mrs. Lytton?"

"We must hear first how far his explorations have taken him, and what they resulted in," replied Dora. "I really don't think there is much of Africa left to explore, by telescope or any other method."

Kitty had followed Arthur and Miss Nugent into the house. Anthony and Lady Frayne now took their steps in the same direction. Trenchard seemed uncertain whether to say good-bye or to go after the rest. The result of his hesitation was that he and Dora were left together in the garden, within sight and hearing of the party in the dining-room.

"A great event!" said Trenchard.

"Quite," answered Dora.

"Arthur will have a good deal to hear as well as tell."

"Yes, there are several surprises in store for him, I think."

"The telescope for one," laughed Trenchard. "That will be an amusing surprise for him."

"And I shall be the most amusing of all, I'm afraid."

"Well, I suppose you will be a surprise to Mrs. Lytton."

"And don't you think I shall be an amusing one?"

"If you mean by that a pleasant one I'll say 'yes' at once."

"I didn't mean that."

"But I really can't assent to any other supposition, Mrs. Lytton."

There was neither flippancy nor badsnage in his tone, which was penetrated with that winning courtesy, touched by a gentle humor, which made most women like him and trust him from the first. Dora's thoughts were all unconsciously borne back to the days of her first love. She did not, however, make any direct reply to what he had last said.

"You are an intimate of the family, Mr. Trenchard," she said; "tell me, please, are Mr. Arthur and Lady Kitty engaged to one another? I would not presume to ask such a question if Mr. Arthur himself had not so openly admitted us to all his confidence."

"Yes, didn't he though? Engaged? No, I never heard that they were engaged, but there is no secret they have been more than friends for I don't know how many years past: ever since Arthur left school, in fact. But, you know, there is not too much money in the coffers at Doyne Abbey, and Lord Frane——"

"And Lady Frayne is a prudent mother? Is that what you mean, Mr. Trenchard?"

"Prudent is the word, I suppose," said he; "an ugly word, in this relation, I always think."

"Maybe," said Dora, "but it has its accepted significance. We are falling more and more into Talleyrand's habit of using speech to conceal our thoughts. I hope your horse is none the worse for his mud bath last night."

"Not a bit, thank you. What a madman I must have seemed to you last night, Mrs. Lytton. I am afraid to think of it."

Trenchard's face grew positively sad, and he looked narrowly at Dora, who was not, however, looking at him.

"Why were you riding in that way over such dangerous ground?" she said; and as there was some abruptness in the question she qualified, or tempered it, with a smile, as though it was asked only half seriously.

(To be Continued.)

The Best in Existence.

Mr. G. N. Boyer, merchant, Carillon, Quebec, writes as follows: "I had a very sore back, which my doctors failed to cure. I was so bad I went to Montreal and consulted the best doctors of that city. The latter pronounced it lumbago and told me to apply a plaster, which I did, but got worse all the time. I then applied St Jacobs Oil, and was much better next morning, and after another application was completely cured. I can highly recommend it as being the best medicine in existence. I can mention another case, a farmer, laid up for some time with sore back and could get nothing to relieve him. He came to my store, bent in two with pain. I persuaded him to try a bottle of the Oil, and told him if it did not cure him it should cost him nothing. A few days later he came in smiling. Two application cured him. This is a man 60 years of age. I know of many such cases."

Mrs. James Dix, Brock street, Kingston, Ont., says: I suffered with an inflamed throat and bad cough for seven months, was treated by physicians without success, when six doses of Miller's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil cured me. It's as palatable as cream. For sale by all druggists. 1
