OUR EARLY DAYS.

Our early days—our early days!
How oft they thrill the lengthening chain!
Their secret sympathies and fears
In memory's morning sky appears,
Like hopes which long in dust have lain.

Our early days; gay, early days!
We view them as a tale that's told;
Unfolding a spring-time flower,
To deck awhile some graceful bower,
Then fade away like dreams of old.

Our early days, they pass away,
While clouds about the present part;
And hope, with her sweet angel lay,
Doth cheer through many a smiling day
The inmost chambers of the heart.

Our early days; too soon their flight
Brings graver thoughts and deeper cares;
With many struggles for the right
Amid the shades of life's dark night,
And fills its measure up with tears.

Yes, early days bear on our minds
An impress time can ne'er wear out;
Each fount of feeling may retain
Some early dream not wholly vain,
To linger yet our way about.

HUGH MILLER,

ON THE DEATH OF HIS FIRST CHILD.

In the spring of 1839, a sad bereavement darkened my household, and for a time left me little heart to pursue my wonted amusements, literary or scientific. We had been visited ten months after our marriage, by a little girl, whose presence had added not a little to our happiness. Home became more emphatically such from the presence of the child, that in a few months had learned so well to know its mother, and in a few more to take its stand in the nurse's arms, and to recognize and make signs to its father, as he approached the house. Its few little words, too, had a fascinating interest to our ears—our own names, lisped in a language of its own, every time we approached; and the single Scotch vocable "awa, awa," which it knew how to employ in such plaintive tones as we retired, and that used to come back to us in recollection, like an echo from the grave, when, its brief visit over, it had left us forever, and its fair face and silken hair lay in darkness, amid the clods of the church-yard. In how short a time had it laid hold of our affections! Two brief years before, and we knew it not; and now it seemed as if the void which it left in our hearts the whole world could not fill. We buried it beside the old chapel of St. Regulus, with the deep rich woods all around, save where an opening in front commands the distant land and blue sea; and where the daisies, which it had learned to love, mottle, star-like, the mossy mounds; and where birds, whose songs its ear had become skilful enough to distinguish, pour their notes over its little grave. The following simple but truthful stanzas, which I found among its mother's papers, seem to have been written in this place—sweetest of burying-places—a few weeks after its burial, when a chill and backward spring, that had scowled upon its lingering illness, broke out at once into genial summer:

Thou'rt "awa, awa," from thy mother's side;
And "awa, awa," from thy father's knee;
Thou'rt "awa" from our blessing, our care, our caressing,
But "awa" from our hearts thou'lt never be.

All things, dear child, that were wont to please thee,
Are around thee here in beauty bright,—
There's music rare in the cloudless air,
And the earth is teeming with living delight.

Thou'rt "awa, awa," from the bursting spring time,
Tho' o'er thy head its green boughs wave;
The lambs are leaving their little footprints
Upon the turf of thy new-made grave.

And art thou "awa, awa," and "awa" forever,—
That little face,—that tender frame,—
That voice which first in sweetest accents,
Call'd me the mother's thrilling name,—

That head of nature's finest moulding—
Those eyes, the deep night ether's blue,
Where sensibility its shadows
Of ever-changing meaning threw?

Thy sweetness, patience under suffering,
All promised as an opening day
Most fair, and told that to subdue thee
Would need but love's most gentle sway.

Ah me! I'd were here I thought to lead thee,
And tell thee what are life and death,
And raise thy serious thought's first waking
To Him who holds our every breath.

And does my selfish heart then grudge thee,
That angels are thy teachers now,—
That glory from thy Saviour's presence
Kindles the crown upon thy brow?

O, no! to me earth must be lonelier,
Wanting thy voice, thy hand, thy love!
Yet dost thou dawn a star of promise,
Mild beacon to the world above.

A TROUBLESOME CONGREGATION.—One Sunday, when the minister of Udney entered the kirk, he was no less surprised than indignant to find that daft Jamie Fleming had taken possession of the pulpit. "Come doon, Jamie," said his reverence. "Come ye up, sir," answered Jamie, "they're a stiff-neckit and rebellious generation, sir, an' it' ill tak' us baith to manage them."

THE LONG SUMMER OF THE ARCTIC REGIONS.

In Doctor Kane's Journal of the Grinne Expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, occurs the following account of the influence of the prolonged arctic summer:

"The perpetual daylight had continued up to this moment with unabated glare. The sun had reached his north meridian altitude some days before; but the eye was hardly aware of change. Midnight had a softened character, like the low summer's sun at home; but there was no twilight. At first the novelty of this great, unvarying day made it pleasing. It was curious to see the 'midnight Arctic sun set into sunrise,' and pleasant to find that whether you ate or slept, or idled or toiled, the same daylight was always there. No irksome night forced upon you its system of compulsory alternations. I could dine at midnight, sup at breakfast-time, and go to bed at noon-day; and but for an apparatus of cogs and coils, called a watch, would have been no wiser and no worse. My feeling was at first an extravagant sense of undefiled relief—of some vague restraint removed. I seemed to have thrown off the slavery of hours. In fact I could hardly realize its entirety. The astral lamp, standing dust-covered on our lockers—I am quoting the words of my journal—puzzled me, as obsolete and fanciful. This was instinctive, perhaps; but by and by came other feelings. The perpetual light, garish and unfluctuating disturbed me. I became gradually aware of an unknown excitant. My sleep was curtailed and irregular, my meal-hours trod upon each other's heels; and, but for stringent regulations of my own imposing, my routine would have been completely broken up. My lot had been cast in the zone of liriodendrons and sugar-maples, in the nearly midway latitude of forty degrees. I had been habituated to day and night; and every portion of these two great divisions had for me its periods of peculiar association. Even in the tropics I had mourned the lost twilight. How much more did I miss the soothing darkness, of which twilight should have been the precursor! I began to feel—with more of emotion than a man writing for others would like to confess to—how admirable, as a systematic law, is the alternation of day and night; words that type the two great conditions of living nature—action and repose. To those who with daily labour earn the daily bread, how kindly the season of sleep! To the drone, who, urged by the wanting daylight, hastens the deferred task, how fortunate that his procrastination has not a six month's morrow! To the brain-workers among men, the enthusiasts, who bear irksomely the dark screen which falls upon their day dreams, how benignant the dear night blessing which enforces reluctant rest!"

GREEK BLOCK FOR THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—An Athens journal says:—The Greek Government has selected a marble block in the Parthenon, for the monument of George Washington, now being raised in the city named after him. It is to bear the following inscription:—"To George Washington, the heroic general, the high-minded citizen, the founder of modern freedom—the land of Solon, Themistocles, and Pericles, the birth-place of ancient freedom, dedicates this old marble as a sign of reverence and admiration."

FRYING PANS.—Nichols's Journal advises Congress to pass an act directing every frying pan in the country to be broken up and sold for old iron, and that no more be manufactured for ever. It is alleged that frying is the most unwholesome mode of cooking, as it saturates the food with fat, or butter, renders it tough, covers it with empyreum oil, and makes it utterly unfit for the human stomach. No dyspeptic should ever eat anything fried, nor any person desirous of avoiding becoming one. Let the food be boiled, roasted, broiled, or baked—anything but fried—if it is desirable to avoid difficulty of digestion and extending human life.

NEW GOLD DOLLAR.—The Secretary of the Treasury has sanctioned a new gold dollar coin, about to be issued from the Mint at Philadelphia. It is about the diameter of a five cent piece, and bears on one side an Indian head with a crown of eagle's feathers, and on the other a wreath, surrounding the words "One Dollar." On the whole, it is a beautiful thing, and its greater diameter will be likely to make it more generally acceptable than the dollar coin now in circulation, which has proved very inconvenient indeed, on account of its too small diameter.

A DARING ACT.—An audacious robbery was perpetrated on the 21st ult., upon the person of the Bishop of Havana who was seized in his audience-chamber by two robbers disguised as priests, who bound him to his secretary with cords, threatening him with instant death on making the slightest noise, and then robbed the Bishop of $10,000. Among the plunder taken, was a diamond ring from the Bishop's hand. The robbers had not been traced.
