Danesbury House.

"Oh, no. Glisson's fate should prove a warning to all who may be acquiring a love for intoxicating liquors. For the sake of a little self-indulgence she forfeited her good home here, lost her self-respect and her fair name, and died in obscurity, an object of charity."

"Isabel says that brother of Mrs. Philip Danesbury is dead. Of course all his children are unprovided for."

"The two daughters, entirely so; but the sons are in a way to get their own living, or soon will be. The eldest is keeping his last term at Oxford, and will be in orders immediately. I saw Mrs. Philip Danesbury this afternoon. She is going to invite her nieces to live with her. It is fortunate she is able and willing to receive them."

"And to tax your purse for it, I conclude," broke forth Mrs. Danesbury. "It is lucky for her family that she married a Danesbury."

The color mounted to Mr. Danesbury's temples, as it had previously mounted to Isabel's. "No," he replied, after a pause of self-control, "Mrs. Philip Danesbury's means are quite equal to her receiving this addition to her household without her requiring me to provide for it."

"Have you seen the boys?" again began Mrs. Danesbury.

"No. But I am sorry to say that I have heard of them. Fox has been to me to complain. They have been over there this afternoon, damaging his hedge, spoiling some linen spread there to dry, and giving him insolence and abuse."

"I am sure they did not," fired Mrs. Danesbury. "Abuse and insolence, indeed! Who is Fox that he should dare to come to you with such a complaint?"

"He made a worse complaint than that," returned Mr. Danesbury. "He says Robert was drunk."

"Absurd!" retorted Mrs. Danesbury. "I care say Fox was not sober himself."

"I should like to know where they are lingering, they are aware of the tea hour. They shall no longer be in idleness; it is the root of all mischief. They seem to have set themselves against coming into the works; and you uphold them, Eliza."

"Yes," answered Mrs. Danesbury. "I wish them to choose professions; not business. Robert has decided upon his; he wants a commission purchased for him."

Mr. Danesbury looked up, not only surprised, but mortified.

"A commission!" he uttered, "whatever put that in his head? I cannot sanction it. I very much disapprove of it."

"He says he will be nothing else," said Mrs. Danesbury, carelessly. "Why do you object to it?"

"I wish all my children to choose a peaceful employment. I am not reflecting on the brave defenders of our country," he hastened to add, "but I prefer that my sons should not fix on the army for a profession. They must turn their thoughts to something useful, in which their time and their talents can be honorably employed; something that will give them an opportunity of saying when they come to their deathbeds, 'I have led a useful life; I have improved the time and powers which it pleased God to entrust to me.'"

"And you believe this can not be, if they enter the army."

"We are at peace," said Mr. Danesbury, "as we have been for many years, and as we seem likely to continue for many years more. An officer of the present day passes his time in idleness; my sons must not so pass theirs."

As Mr. Danesbury spoke, Robert and Lionel entered. Good-looking youths both, but as yet less noble in form and feature than their brothers, Arthur and William. Mr. Danesbury informed them of the complaint of Fox, the nurseryman. "He says you in particular behaved very shamefully, Robert."

"The vile old sinner! It's a lie. Papa—"

"Sir!" reproved Mr. Danesbury, "you forget yourself. No i l language before me. Tell me what really happened. The truth, mind; for I shall investigate this. In the first place, what had you been taking?"

"Taking!" echoed Robert, who had inherited his mother's crabbed temper.

"To drink. Fox says that you were not sober."

"I'll wring Fox's neck if he comes to you again with tales about us. If anybody was not sober it was himself," hastily added Robert, for Mr. Danesbury had raised his hand in displeasure. "Fox was in such a passion he could neither see nor hear."

"As I said," interposed Mrs. Danesbury. "You took beer with your dinner, and your glass of wine after it." Mr. Danesbury might have said two glasses. "What else did you take?"

"Only a drop of cider."

"Where did you get that?"

Robert was silent. He would have preferred not to say where. But he knew there might be no trifling when thus brought face to face with his father.

"I was dreadfully thirsty; I suppose it was the fish at dinner; and I got a drop of cider."

"Where did you get it?" repeated Mr. Danesbury.

"In a beer shop."

"Beer, wine and cider! no wonder Fox had the complaint to make," said Mr. Danesbury, in a severe tone, while Isabel had looked up startled. "I will speak to you about this when we are alone, Robert. Go on to what you did at Fox's."

"We did nothing. I just got over his hedge, and there was a big table-cloth, or something, spread out there, like a sail, and it got torn. Fox said we should pay for it; and I said that I should not, for his insolence."

"But what brought you over his hedge at all?"

"It was in our way," haughtily answered Robert, "and we were in a hurry."

"What is that you are saying?" interrupted Mr. Danesbury. "Whatever may be your hurry, you have no right to go broadcast over other people's land and hedges."

"The land is ours, papa."

"No, sir, it is his. So long as he hires it from me, and pays me rent for it, it is his. I have always found Fox a civil, respectful man, and I know you must have provoked him more unjustifiably to induce him to be otherwise. The fact is, as I have been telling your mamma, you must be idle no longer. Now that it is decided you do not go to school again, you must choose what you will be. I should prefer your both coming to the works; there is room for all of you; yes," added Mr. Danesbury, with emphasis, "room for all four of my sons and an ample and increasing income."

Robert Danesbury turned up his nose. The two boys had been to a noted aristocratic private school, where they had learned thoroughly to despise "business." Robert had told his mamma that he should never "soil his hands with it," and she upheld him.

"I intend to go into the army, papa."

"And I want to be a doctor," cried Lionel, who was a good-natured, pleasant, nice lad."

"Anything but that Robert," said Mr. Danesbury. "Choose anything but that."

The question was not settled that evening; no, nor for several evenings after it. Robert Danesbury was thoroughly obstinate over it; he laughed contemptuously in his sleeve at his father's arguments about leading a useful life; he was bent on obtaining his own will, and at last he said—ay, and told Mr. Danesbury—that if he could not have a commission bought, he would enlist, for go into the army he would.

Mrs. Danesqury's system of training had begun to tell. It was working already in Robert Danesbury's undutifully refusing to yield his wishes to his father's in his persistency in embracing the one only calling which was distasteful to Mr. Danesbury. Why was Robert Danesbury so eager to enter the army? That he might serve his country? Not at all; but he had acquired a passion for a red coat and for a life of idleness and pleasure.

One day he ran up to his eldest brother. "Arthur, I wish you would persuade papa about my commission. He will listen to you. Mamma says she has teased him till she is tired. He consented readily to Lionel's being a physician, and just because I want my commission he won't give it me. Will you persuade him?"

"No, I cannot, Robert. I do not like the army for you, any more than he does. Choose something else. Would you like to be a barrister, as Tom Searle is going to be?"

"I will not be anything but an officer," returned Robert, sullenly; "my mind is made up, and nothing shall turn it. You are as unkind as you can be, Arthur."

Arthur laughed, and looked full in his face, and the cloud passed away from Robert's as he met the kindly gaze. He knew there were not many brothers in the world so good and affectionate as Arthur had ever been.

"Won't you persuade papa?"

"No, my boy, I could only do so against my conscience and my judgment, for I do not believe a commission would conduce to your happiness or welfare."

But Robert Danesbury, helped by his mother, carried his point, and Mr. Danesbury, under sore protest, at length consented to apply to the horse guards for the purchase of a commission. Lionel was placed with Mr. Pratt, the surgeon at Eastborough, to go through the necessary steps and grades toward becoming eventually a physician. It was arranged that he should pass his evenings and nights at home. Mr. Danesbury and Mr. Pratt were close friends and the latter was pleased to receive Lionel. He was a man of sorrow, though he maintained outward cheerfulness. It arose from the conduct of his son; he had but one, who was turning out as badly as he could well do. He was never now seen at Eastborough, but was sometimes heard of in London.

"Remarkable Cure of Dropsy and Dyspepsia."—Mr. Samuel T. Casey, Belleville, writes: "In the spring of 1884 I began to be troubled with dyspepsia, which gradually became more and more distressing. I used various domestic remedies and applied to my family physician, but received no benefit. By this time my trouble assumed the form of dropsy. I was unable to use any food whatever except boiled milk and bread; my limbs were swollen to twice their natural size; all hopes of my recovery were given up, and I quite expected death within a few weeks. Northrop & Lyman's VEGETABLE DISCOVERY having been recommended to me, I tried a bottle with but little hope of relief; and now, after using eight bottles, my Dyspepsia and Dropsy are cured. Although now 79 years of age I can enjoy my meals as well as ever, and my general health is good. I am well-known in this section of Canada, having lived here 57 years; and you have liberty to use my name in recommendation of your VEGETABLE DISCOVERY, which has done such wonders in my case." 1

TALLEST WOMAN IN THE WORLD

She Is Nearly Seven Feet Ten Inches High and May Grow a Foot More.

NEW YORK, Nov. 16.—The Universal Hotel, Clarkson street, has the distinction of entertaining the tallest woman in the world. Aama Bataillard is her name and she is only 16 years and 3 months old. She measures 7 feet 10 inches in height.

Aama came to America on the Etruria, and arrived Sunday in New York. She will proceed shortly to Chicago, where she will go on exhibition. Aama is considerably inconvenienced by her abnormal stature. She has to go gloveless, because the dimensions of her hands are 6 inches by 12 inches. Accurate measurements show that her feet are 16 inches long.

What is still worse, the doctors have prophesied that Aama may grow a foot or more before she matures. She rested comfortably while crossing the ocean by means of the junction of two double beds. The steward of the steamship pronounced her a huge feeder, which is consistent with Aama's proportions.

The young woman's height is not hereditary. Her parents measure 5 feet 6 inches and 5 feet 3 inches respectively, and none of Aama's ancestors are known to have attained to her distinguishing altitude. As a child Aama was unusually bulky. She grew up in a rural town near the border of France and Switzerland, and spent her youth in field labor. She speaks only a French dialect. She is a blonde, having scant yellow locks. No scientific reasons have ever been assigned for Aama's unusual development. She weighs 210 French pounds, but has not yet been on American scales.

Aama has energy proportioned to her size. She can walk miles at a time and lift very heavy weights. She is not an expert at sparring or athletic arts, much to the satisfaction of her acquaintances. One is impressed with the dignity of Aama's presence, if she only stands and gazes in an impassive way at the lilliputians about her.

DAIRY DOINGS.

The Practicability of Paying for Milk on Its Merits.

The traveling dairy has been holding meetings recently at Atwood, Listowel, Gowanstown, Linwood, Wellesby, Elmira, Winterbourn, Bloomingdale, Berlin and Hamburg. At Atwood some interesting facts were gleaned, with regard to the practicability of paying for milk according to the test, as this is the first factory in the west that has adopted this method.

The composite test is used, two ounces of milk being taken from each patron's milk after it is poured into the weighing can and thoroughly stirred, and the maker said there was practically no delay. At the end of the week the samples are tested, the milk being dissolved by concentrated lye, and then thoroughly mixed and the sample taken. The method is giving very good satisfaction among the patrons, and also to the maker. He has had less tainted milk this year than in his previous fourteen years' work at the factory. It pays to look after the milk. An instance he gave illustrates this:

A patron sent milk to the factory, which, in the spring, tested about 3.7 per cent. Through June and July, when the weather got warm, his milk began to test low, and finally dropped to 3 per cent. He came up to the factory to see what was the matter, and the milk happened just then to be in the weighing can, and the maker called his attention to the hardened cream around the can, and advised him to aerate and stir his milk more. The man did so, and next week it read 3.3 per cent. He then made provision for cooling the milk as well as aerating it, and it came up to 3.5 per cent. the next week, and never went below that after.

Another incident was almost laughable: A lady calling on a neighbor remarked that she had no cream. "Well," said her neighbor, "there is no cream anywhere this summer since they started to pay by the test at the factory." It paid to send the cream there.

The variation in the price paid per 100 pounds of milk was also quite marked. In May it ranged from 65⅔ cents to 81 cents, in June from 65 cents to 82 6-10 cents, in July from 68½ cents to 80½ cents, and in August from 57 cents to 81¼ cents.

The deputation will be working in South Waterloo, and meetings will be held at Dundee, Ayr, Galt, Hespeler and Doon, when they go into Wellington county.
