Little Jack Rabbit

by David Cory

"Dear me, I hope Mother is all right," thought Little Jack Rabbit, although he had already said it aloud in the last story, you remember, Little Reader, as he hopped quickly along the Shady Forest Trail.

"What's your hurry?" asked Squirrel Nutcracker, looking down from his neat bungalow in the treetop.

"Danny Fox gave Mother a dreadful fright while I was away," answered the little bunny. "I'm hurrying home," and away he went faster than ever.

"What's the matter?" asked Chippy Chipmunk, as the bunny boy sped by the little chipmunk's burrow under the roots of the Big Chestnut Tree.

"Don't stop me," shouted back the anxious little rabbit. "Mother has had a dreadful fright," and away he went, even faster than before. By and by, after a while and a hop and a mile, but never a smile, for the poor little rabbit grew more anxious at every jump, he reached the Sunny Meadow. Squeezing through the Old Rail Fence he sped down the Old Cow Path, clipperty clip, lipperty lip and in a few minutes he was hopping up the winding path through the bramble bushes.

"Mother, mother!" he shouted, hopping up on the back porch and into the kitchen. The next minute he was in Lady Love's arms. Yes, in mother's arms. The dearest place in all the world.

"Yes, we had a wonderful time with that old fox in the kitchen," sighed Cousin Cottontail, as she finished telling the bunny boy all that had happened while he had been away.

Then, like a sensible rabbit lady, she put on her bonnet and black silk mitts and kissed Lady Love and the bunny boy goodby. "I declare, I've forgotten what I came over for," she sighed, as she opened the door.

"A pinch of salt," answered Lady Love. "Dear me, no wonder we forget it. That dreadful fox has put every idea out of my head. I couldn't say the alphabet I'm so nervous.

"There, there," said Mrs. Cottontail, tucking the small package of salt in her vanity bag. "forget what has happened," and away she hopped back to her comfortable bungalow under the Old Brush Heap on the hillside.

Just then Tiny Miss Cricket and the Three Little Grasshoppers began to sing and play. They had hidden their faces when the old fox had crept toward Lady Love. They couldn't bear to see that pretty little rabbit thrown into an empty sack. But now that all worry was over, they sang and fiddled till the neat little kitchen was filled with music.

Pretty soon the Canary Bird from her gilded cage over the red geraniums in the green box at the windowsill, began to chirp and trill, happy that danger was past. And, would you believe it, the next minute the Cuckoo Bird from her little Clock House on the wall, shouted right out loud:

"Danny Fox with his bushy tail
Must sweep his cell in the Rabbitville jail."

And in the next story you shall hear what happened after that.

Countess Sent to Prison

FOR EIGHT YEARS FOR SHOOTING HER HUSBAND.

St. Brieuc, France, May 11—Countess De Kerninon yesterday was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment for shooting her husband. The shooting occurred August 2, 1924, and the Count died ten days later.

The convicted woman was a former singer in cabarets in Northern Africa. She shot her husband when he refused to sign deeds of his property over to her, complaining that he was dissipating his patrimony with a young woman.

Headset and Loud Speaker Polarity

EDITED BY JOHN M. CLAYTON.

If you have a neutrodyne receiver or any receiver using a two-stage audio-frequency amplifier, the direct current from your B battery through the headset or loudspeaker is comparatively large. This is especially so if you are using a high plate voltage on your amplifier tubes. In fact the current drawn from the battery and flowing through the headset is likely to be so high that it will ultimately weaken the magnetism of the magnets in the headset, if the current is not flowing in the proper direction through the headset. If flowing in the wrong direction the magnetic field set up in the coils of the headset is in the opposite direction to the field of the magnets themselves. These two fields tend to buck each other, and if this is allowed to go on very long the magnetism of the headset will be considerably weakened.

For this reason a number of headset manufacturers supply their headsets with cords whose two terminal wires have "tracer" wires in them. Usually the red tracer is standard. The other wire may have a green, white yellow or brown tracer. The red tracer terminal should be connected toward the B battery and the other terminal toward the plate of the last tube. This connection is shown in our diagram above. The tracer wire is a single strand (or several strands bunched together) woven into the braided cord.

If you set has jacks for termination of the headset wires, and a plug on the headset or speaker, you will have to trace out the connections of the set to see which way the headset terminals are to be connected to the plug. In general it is more or less standard to connect the bottom terminal of the jack (the frame of the jack itself) to the B battery and the upper spring to the plate. This calls for the red tracer of the headset being connected to the sleeve of the plug. The sleeve is the part of the plug which makes contact with the frame of the jack, and it is insulated by a small bushing from the tip, or round terminal at the end of the plug. The tip should be connected to the other tracer wire.

It is well worth while to have these connections properly poled. In addition to lengthening the life of the magnets in the headset in a number of cases with the correct polarity the magnets are actually strengthened and signals will be louder.
