LECTURE BY MR. T. MILLER, ON THE IDENTITY OF THE BRITISH NATION, WITH THE LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL &C.

After some preliminary remarks, stating the object of the lecture and drawing a distinction between Israël and Judah, the lecturer went on to show that it was prophesied that Israel should possess the Isles of the sea, and the coasts of the earth and the waste places, and that they should be a numerous people, and be planted in a land which should become too small for them,—what nation could correspond to this description, but the British? The lecturer after adverting to the history of the Jews, read a number of passages from the prophets to show the distinction between Judah and Israel. The Kingdom of Israel under Jereboam fell into Idolatry 725 years before Christ. They were under obligations to Mr. Hine, Mr. Sharon Turner and others for investigations relative to this subject. The Jews were of Israel, but the ten tribes were never Jews and inherited a different class of prophecies, from Judah. The prophecies concerning Judah were being fulfilled every day. The lecturer here dwelt strongly on the distinction between Judah and Israel, representing that the former was under curses, while the latter was under blessings. Israel when lost was to be unknown, while Judah was to be a bye-word, one was to be strong and the other weak. Israel was to be an Island people, possessors of large colonies, while Judah was only to be tolerated. Israel was to become Christian while Judah remained under the Mosaic dispensation. (The lecturer here read a number of passages from the prophets.) The Assyrian captivity of Israel was complete, while the Babylonish captivity of Judah was only partial. The Israelites remained in the region of Media in Asia, and Christ sent his apostles not to the Gentiles, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The Israelites went to Media and Josephus says they remained there and they inhabitrd this region in the days of the apostles. The lecturer said his object was to shew that in Media the ancestors of the British people were also to be traced. Sharon Turner says it is an interesting fact that our own immediate ancestors were Celtic. Herodotus says the Celts had their origin in the eastern part of Asia, and it was the same locality to which the Israelites were carried captive by the Assyrians. In the time of Herodotus the Celts had also gained a footing in Europe. The origin of the Anglo Saxons were the Sakaii from whom Ptolemy also mentions a Scythian people as springing. Our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, therefore, appear to have come from that part of Asia where the ten tribes, constituting the kingdom of Israel after their revolt and separation from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, were carried away captive and lost, as with the Assyrian captivity the history of these ten tribes ends. In the days of the Apostles the ancestors of the British were in Cappadocia and adjacent regions, and Christ commanded his Apostles to visit the lost sheep of the house of Israel. They did so and thus visited our British forefathers in these very regions. Sharon Turner attempted to shew who the ancestors of the Anglo-Saxons were, and remarks that race did not belong to Media, but the Israelites had given up genealogy and thus lost their identity. It had been thought that the British were a mixture of races, till God's time came to clear the matter up. Thus their origin had been traced from Media, the scene of the captivity of the lost Israel, and as a nation they had done what it was prophesied the lost tribes were to accomplish. Then it was said that Israel was to be an Island people. (Here the lecturer quoted a number of passages from the prophets.) They were to inhabit Islands of the Western sea, also in the Northwest and to come out of the land of the North, This answered to the description of the British Isles. The language of the first settlers in the north of Ireland contained many Hebrew terms, one in particular signifying "Dan's resting place," and many others; the same might be said of the west of Scotland and Wales Dan having landed in Ireland and Simeon in Scotland, and to find Dan is to find Israel. It was also said that Israel after arriving in the Isles should meet with much war, and this had been the case with the British nation, raised from the East, which had continually grown in power ever since. The English language contained about 800 Hebrew words or roots; it was destined to be a universal language and was now even established as part of the instruction in the schools of China and Japan. It was also said that the land would be too small for them, and that they would have to colonize. The lecturer contended that this could not apply to the Jews; these colonies were part of the covenant, and it was remarkable that the British alone had succeeded as a colonizing nation. Thus did we discover Israel, and the accomplishment of prophecy, and our nation's history had come to be a proof of the bible. The lecturer then referred to the prophecies in reference to the perpetuity of David's race, which he contended could not apply to Christ. The line of David ruled till the Babylonish captivity when the daughters of King Zedekiah escaped. Hine says of the prophet Jeremiah, that he died somewhere, but no one knew where, if he was slain as reported, at the palace, he could not have fulfilled the two commissions entrusted to him, namely to root out and pull down and to build and to plant. He contended that the mission of Jeremiah was to remove the crown from Judah and place it on Israel, and that he fulfilled his mission by coming to Ireland, and bringing with him the King, Zedekiah's daughter, and also that wonderful stone of destiny, now placed beneath the Coronation chair in Westminister Abbey. By some this has been called "Jacob's Pillar," and its existence has been known for 2400 years. On the arrival of the stone in Ireland, the ship was wrecked, and the then King of Ulster desired to be crowned on it. Some person was there who passed for a prophet, and this was probably the prophet Jeremiah with the King's daughter. The Irish King was one Heremon of the tribe of Dan, who was presumed to have escaped to Ireland at the time of the Assyrian captivity. He consented to renounce Baalism and marry the Princess Tephi, Zedekiah's daughter, on condition that the prophet should promise perpetuity to his line—thus the line of David. Hence the School of the prophets of Tara. As for the "stone of Destiny," Kings had been crowned on it for over 2,000 years, and if it was a dead dull thing, it had a mighty voice. From Heremon a King of the Irish Federation, and through the Scottish Kings, the sceptre had descended to our present Queen. The lecturer here read an article from an American paper adverting to the growing power of England (who would soon be mistress of Southern Asia) under Beaconsfield in consequence of his policy both in regard to European and Asiatic affairs. The English had, indeed, lost one colony, that of the United States, but even this had been intimated by prophecy. In conclusion Mr. Miller said he had endeavored only to give an outline of this subject, but he hoped it would encourage us in the study of the Bible, and in extending missionary enterprise.

The Rev. Dr. Jardine said he had much pleasure in tendering a vote of thanks to the lecturer, and some would no doubt be rather astonished at the conclusions arrived at. There were, however, important points that deserved their attention, and one of these was the difference between Judah and Israel, which was mentioned by Jeremiah, Isaiah and Ezekiel. Some of the prophecies concerning Israel presented remarkable coincidences, and the lecturer had asserted that Judah was represented by the modern Jews. There was a good deal clear, but the question was, notwithstanding the prophetical coincidences, did profane history support the theory? But history had so far failed on this point. Mr. Miller had urged that the Anglo Saxons had their origin in Media, where Isaael had been carried captive, and that they afterwards came west as far as Macedon and the north of Syria, and it was into these regions that Christ sent his apostles. But were we to believe that these were our Saxon forefathers? It may also be objected that those Israelites were christianized. They were then told that these progenitors of the Saxons went to the Northwest of Germany and England, but when they got there they were not Christians. Could they have lost Christianity in so short a time? Glover says that there are 800 Hebrew roots in the ancient Irish language, but the same might probably be asserted of noble languages in common, and such traces might be found in India, and in the Greek language. The next point was the identity of Queen Victoria with the house of David, whose line terminated in Zedekiah. We were told that this King's daughter came over with Jeremiah to Ireland. There is certainly an Irish legend about a Princess arriving in Tara, but the Irish legend appeared to be of greater antiquity than the time of Jeremiah. There were some other things he might say with reference to this matter, but the lineal descent was doubtful. Paul, however, had distinguished between the lineal and spiritual descendants of Israel. Many Anglo Saxons believed that the spirit had descended upon those who through faith and obedience had merited the fulfilment of the promise, and when they looked at the efforts which were made in the direction of evangalization, the Anglo Saxon race might be regarded as fulfilling these conditions. He believed ultimately, however, that the British nation would possess Palestine, not so much on account of prophecy, as threugh necessity, and that the flag of England would one day wave over Mount Zion. We were a great empire, and our vital point was the Suez Canal, if we lost that we must die, on account of our communication with India being cut off. For this purpose the Isle of Cyprus had been acquired, and he believed the great object of Russian policy under what ever guise, and whether actively manifested in Afghanistan or elsewhere, was the destruction of British Power. In the next war, England would probably be seriously involved, and be obliged to acquire Palestine and Alexandria, and so might go from Cyprus to Jerusalem. Thus, whatever we may hold regarding the lineal descent of the British from the House of Israel, there is no doubt but we now inherit many of the promises made to Israel and possibly may soon become actual and permanent possessors of the land promised to the covenant seed of Abraham.
