DISAFFECTION IN AUSTRALIA

From the Melbourne Argus, April 15.

We want freedom. With that, all would go well. To achieve this grand disideratum should be the principle object of that body, which affects to represent the public. We shall get it some day, and with the so-called representatives rests the alternative of acquiring it for us by constitutional means, or leaving it to be eventually taken by a more summary process. One or other must be done, and that right early. The times brook no delay. Under ordinary circumstances we might be contented to linger along in the semi death, social and political, which England appears to consider the proper condition for her colonial offspring; but this torpid condition disgraceful to us as men, and doubly disgraceful to us as representatives of the vaunted race of Anglo Saxons, is utterly incompatible with our present condition. We must be free. The main duty of our council will be to point out the mode. At present we are mere slaves—subject to the mistrule, and owing to the caprices of an irresponsible nominee, who bitter experience has taught us may be both a very bad and a every silly man. We are slaves to all intents and purposes, and our chains are not the less galling because they are gilt with some fanciful mockery of freedom. How true is this, when the very body of whose composition we now speak, the "Legislative Council" itself—that "deliberative assembly" to which we ought to look as the constitutional means for redressing all our grievances—that body upon which, as men knowing what freedom is, we ought to be able immediately to rely, is nothing better than an assembly deliberately packed of squatters and nominee where the people's voice is scarcely heard, and where their few real representatives are constantly outvoted upon every great question, but the votegiving machines of the nominee master of this nation of slaves.

All this will have to change. The present state of things cannot last. A government may linger on, utterly unpopular, for a while, but the insolence, defiance of public opinion, which is the grand characteristic of our present executive, carries within itself the seeds of its own destruction, and the destruction too, of the vile system which could have organized it. A change must come, and we call upon the legislature of Victoria seriously to beware that it come peacefully. We want no outbreak. We hate bloodshed, whether the single murder of the gallows, or the wholesale murder of the melee; but we cannot always continue a race of slaves, and the most abject soul amongst us may rest assured that we shall not.

We write this principally for the satisfaction of those mealy mouthed politicians who cannot bear to speak above their breath or those timid totterers who look upon every bold stride in the march of freedom as a social revolution—a shaking of the very fabric of society; and who tremble at a reform, however slight, with the childish fear that the next thing will be the demand of an infuriated multitude for their money and their life. For ourselves, our repose has never been haunted by such dreams.—with some little experience of the mind and disposition of our countrymen, we have the most unfaltering reliance on the love of order, sense of justice, deference to the law, fair dealing, and general intelligence of the great masses of a British people. When timid twaddlers, then, have bored us with imaginary dangers, we have already put down their hallucinations to the unhappy prejudices in which they have been reared: to their wish to bolster up some iniquity which was personally profitable to themselves; or the want of that experience in the organization of the English mind which would have enabled them to chase such spectral illusions from their own.

Cheered always by the firm reliance we have mentioned we suffer little dread under any almost possible contingency, and if it should please Providence to allow the earth to swallow up, like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, the whole Victorian executive tomorrow, from the Lieutenant Governor down to the most insignificant police constable or crown nominee who has ever submitted to the indignity of the Government brand, we believe firmly that the people of Victoria are quite capable of organizing in one month, amongst themselves, a better government in every department of the public service. Or if Great Britain should cast off tomorrow the tow-line by which she drags us along the muddy ditch of her colonial policy, we have such confidence in our fellow colonists as to know with certainty, that our safety would be greater, our prosperity more firmly established, our national character higher, our progress more rapid, and ourselves bolder, greater, better men than will ever be the case in our present condition of mise able vassalage.

The charge will come. We believe that it is far better for both countries that it should come quietly. And to that end we conceive that it is essential that it should come soon. There is nothing so much to be depreciated as that the feeling of acrimony should be engendered between England and Australia, which now so largely taints all her communications with our elder brother of America. Every effort should be made, that we part kindly when we do part; and it is therefore, better that we prepare to part betimes.
