DESERTERS WHO WERE LET OFF EASY ARE LIABLE TO REARREST

Government Is Expected To Pass Order-in-Council Soon.

WILL BE RETROACTIVE

Men Who Have Escaped With Fines May Be Again Apprehended.

OTTAWA, Feb. 26.—The Journal Press carries the following:

Deserters from military service are to be dealt with more sternly. It is understood that the Government has passed an order-in-council placing the minimum fine to be imposed upon such deserters at $250, and the maximum fine at $5,000.

It is further understood that this order-in-council will be retroactive, that is to say, that any deserter who has already given himself up and been let off with a fine of less than $250, can be rearrested and refined at least to the minimum amount fixed in the new order.

This will mean that hundreds of Quebec deserters who have been let off with a $5 fine are liable to rearrest.

Secrets of Health and Happiness

What You Ought to Know About Soaps and Your Skin

By DR. LEONARD KEENE HIRSHBERG,
A. B., M. A., M. D., (Johns Hopkins University.)

Most soaps are made of fats and so-called fatty acids. This compound is treated with alkalis, such as caustic soda or caustic potash, and the result is the soap you buy. There are also soft and liquid soaps, but these are alkaline.

There are some soaps which have "free alkali." This means that too much of the caustic material has been used in the manufacture of the soap, so that the amount of the fatty acid present has no effect on the free part of the alkali. This kind of soap is the cheapest in the market, and may be used for scrubbing floors or household utensils of the particularly greasy, dirty nature.

If applied to the skin in any single arer, the face, hands or scalp, it is very apt to cause dryness, chapping and roughness of an unpleasant type. All this is because the "free alkali" in the soap combines readily with most of the oil present upon the skin. It may often leave the skin bare of any lubricating oil whatever.

Best Soap for the Skin.

The kind of soap that may be used freely upon the skin—even the face—is that which contains an equal proportion of the acid fat and caustic soda or potash. This has no "free alkali" in it, and is therefore bland or neutral. Such, for example, is pure castile soap. Castile soap is neutral in so far as its chemical nature is concerned, but it is by no means neutral as a cleanser. After all is said and done, cleansing is practically the greatest and the humblest virtue of which the best soap can boast.

To be applied to the skin and to leave no blemish in its trail is all that a soap can do for you. It should combine with a part but by no means all of the oil on the skin, and with particles of dirt that lodge there, and thus render the complexion sweet and clean. This is "its best," and better than that the angels cannot do.

So neutral is castile soap, and harmless, therefore, that it is used to soothe and to cleanse the skin of the baby's wee body. It is not only put upon baby's skin with good effect, but it is applied internally as a mouth wash or as an antidote for some acid poisons, or even given as an aenema to assist the child's intestinal canal in its work.

When in the child's mouth castile soap combines with the bacteria there, and prevents the formation of decay. Here it is not only a mechanical cleaner but an actual preventive of fermentation of the teeth and gums.

Sometimes you are disappointed with the nature of your skin even after you have employed nothing but neutral soap. You blame the soap, and wonder what is a good substitute for it. You let your thoughts run from one soap advertisement to another. You may purchase them all. The perfume of one soap attracts you, and the color of another charms you, while the well-carved shape of still another decides its purchase.

Know How to Use Soaps

You are back where you started, and you would fain still traverse the long road to beauty. But the by-paths are arduous and wearisome. What then? The skin specialist.

When you began to abandon the use of a simple neutral soap, you were perhaps not aware that you were really avoiding the results you were seeking. The "fountain of youth" and beauty lay at your doors, only you did not know how to wash your face with it.

Perhaps you didn't rub the soap properly to produce the results you wanted. If blackheads clogged your pores, you should have rubbed the lather of the soap vigorously, and if need be with the aid of the soft brush. You should first steam the face, if possible.

To do this effectively, apply hot cloths, until the flesh is reddened. Meanwhile, make a lather of soap suds on a wash cloth. Rub it into the pores of the skin. The pores are now sufficiently opened by the hot application to allow the soap suds to enter and to cleanse them of any foreign matter.

If after this you find your blackheads are still present, it may be necessary to cover your fingers with a handkerchief and press slightly upon the surface infected by the obnoxious "pest."

This treatment practiced a few times will carry away dirt particles, hardened oil and any other dead cutaneous matter. It also hastens the flow of the blood stream, so that the complexion will receive a much desired stimulation.

Iron Skin With Ice.

After the blackheads are out, rinse your face in cold water. This aids the skin to close up the opened pores. If this operation has been neglected, dirt particles may find their way into the pores more readily than before.

After the dash of cold water on the face, secure a piece of ice and use it as an iron up and down over the skin to smooth it out. This will help further to close the pores and to make them as small as they can be made.

Now, you have not only cleansed your face, but you have also stimulated it to a rosy complexion. If rosiness hasn't come to stay permanently, perhaps extreme sallowness has taken its departure for good.

After such a massage, you need only apply a good talcum powder to remove the signs of the wash, and your skin has begun to achieve the freshness, sweetness and velvety appearance you wish.

Answers to Health Questions

MR. N. J. T.: Q.—Kindly advise me what to do for sleeplessness.

2. Kindly advise me what to do to improve my complexion.

A. Sleeplessness often follows overfatigue, exhaustion and late hour habits. Those who retire at 8 or 9 are less often affected. Emotions and other excitements are causes. Electrical treatment by high frequency current, static electricity, mechanical vibration on the neck, head or abdomen, hot mustard foot baths, hot drinks of milk, lemonade or other harmless beverages, hot packs or cold wet sheets, hot water bags, laxatives, ice packs, message, hot blankets, and other non-drugging methods, all have conquests to their credit. Medicines are unsafe measures.

2.—If you will apply a little of the following to your face about three times a week you will find it beneficial:

Oil of almonds.....1 ounce.
Tincture of benzoin .....1½ ounces
Rosewater .....1 ounce

TO-MORROW'S HOROSCOPE

By Genevieve Kemble

FRIDAY, FEB. 28.

While the stellar forces are indicative of a rather busy day, it will probably call for cool judgment for its successful manipulation, two of the malefics being adversely placed. One exerts its detriment in the way of rash and impetuous words and deeds, trending to wear dispute and litigation, the other through undoing through treachery, fraud and deception. With this forewarning heeded, however, there are many astrological reasons why the day should be turned to advantage. This applies to all commercial and professional pursuits—excepting those relating to the fine arts—as Mercury is strongly fortified by both luminaries. With the above admonition in mind, it is a propitious time for signing letters, contracts and documents. Those in employment are under favorable auspicions for advancement.

Those whose birthday it is may expect a successful year if they are on guard against treachery and avoid litigation. A child born on this day will be bright, intelligent and quick, but should be schooled in being trustworthy, settled and dependable.

Good Night Stories

DAVID MEETS BILLY ERMINE.

One day last summer as David ran through the woods on his way to school a queer little animal darted out the bushes and ran down the road as fast as his short legs could carry him.

"A weasel! As sure as I'm alive!" exclaimed David dropping his school books and giving chase. I bet he's been prowling around someone's chicken coop!"

"What makes you think so?" laughed a squeaky voice in David's ear. David turned his head to find his little elfin friend, Squeedee, perched on his shoulder.

"That's about all weasels are good for!" David exclaimed.

"But that's not a weasel!" replied Squeedee. "It's Billy Ermine."

"Well, he certainly looked like a weasel. I'd like to see him closer," laughed David.

Squeedee blew on his magic whistle, and Billy Ermine peeped out from the bushes. When he saw who was calling he came running toward Squeedee.

"I ran because I'm afraid of most boys," squeaked Billy Ermine, and he had a good laugh when Squeedee told him that David had thought he was Billy Weasel.

"Glad to say I'm not," he squeaked, "for Weasel doesn't bear a very good reputation. He's somewhat of a chicken thief, even if he is my cousin."

"I can see now that you're much larger than he is," replied David. "But I thought ermine fur was white, and your coat is reddish brown and your vest a dirty white."

"Oh, you're thinking about my winter suit," laughed Billy Ermine, and he shook out his bushy tail, the end of which boasted of a beautiful black tip. "You see if we wore these suits in the winter time folks could see us too plainly against the white snow, so we dress in white in the winter time. How many women would be as proud of a piece of brown ermine as they are of our white fur? No sir, they all love our white fur around their necks."

"I think myself it's prettier," laughed David. "But I never knew before that you changed your clothes. It's a good idea, for with a white suit on they can't see you so plainly against the snow."

"Camouflaged, so you might say," laughed Squeedee.

"All but the end of my tail," squeaked Billy Ermine. "It always stays black."

Just then the school bell rang, David bade his friends good-bye and hurried on to school.

It was only last week that David saw Billy Ermine again, all dressed up in his suit of white. He saw with his own eyes that what Billy Ermine had told him was true. Then David ran home and told me the story I've just told you.

Jimmy Coon and His Friends

The Adventures of the Little People of the Great Forest.

THE BATH.

On that big log Cousin Bruin was on the shore and shaking the water from his big fur coat; for he had been in the swamp eating salad for his lunch, and those two fishermen, Teddy Possum and Jimmy Coon, were on the water end of the log, holding on for dear life with their sharp claws. The log was teetering back and forth like a see-saw.

And all at once Cousin Bruin jumped off suddenly (for he wanted to root around in the roots of an old tree for little insects and worms in the dead wood), and what do you think happened? Well, were you ever on a see-saw when somebody jumped off without giving you warning? Well, if you ever were, then you can guess what happened to those two rascals, Jimmy Coon and Teddy Possum. They went plump into that cold water! And it was very deep, and they had to swim for dear life. Soon they climbed out, but their new fur coats were nearly ruined, and they looked so miserable that Cousin Bruin just laughed.

Sammy Muskrat's cousin came up on the bank, but he didn't feel sorry at all, for he likes water, and he thinks it is the safest place to be for any sensible person.

Chatterbox, the Red Squirrel, came running up. He is the reporter of the woods, and he just wears himself out gathering up all the news and running back and forth in the Great Forest to tell it to the other little people. He had just told them all about the woman and the berries and the little boy, and how everybody laughed. And now when he saw what had happened to poor Jimmy and Teddy he said: "Well, Jimmy Coon, you'll catch it now! Just look at your new fur coat, and look at that big hole in the shoulder. You'll catch it when you get home!"

Poor Jimmy began to whimper, and Chatterbox hurried off to tell the news first, but little Mrs. Weaver Bird had a nest on a branch hanging over the water, and she said: "Now, don't cry, Jimmy. If Mr. Hairy Woodpecker will just give me a few hairs I can sew up that hole in the jacket of a lamb's tail." And so dear little Mrs. Weaver Bird just sewed Jimmy up, and Jimmy had to lie down on his right side, and he put his little black hand and his long, thin arm down into the water, and he found Mrs. Mud Turtle's pantry, and he just ate a few fresh eggs while Mrs. Weaver Bird was weaving him up. And Cousin Bruin was digging up grubs.

And Jimmy Coon had had such a hard time working to find Cousin Bruin things to eat that he began to feel happy when Mrs. Weaver Bird was so kind to him. It was the first time he had felt happy in several days.

MY SOLDIER HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S CONTINUATION OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Lillian Said "We'll Not Say 'Forgive'—We'll Simply Forget."

Lillian's arms went around me as I reached her side, her voice sounded in my ear:

"Steady, dear, until these men get away."

The next moment she had loosened her arms and with her usual calm efficiency was courteously speeding the departure of Major Grantland and Allen Drake.

Alone in her wonderful brown-toned library while she escorted her guests to the door there came to me an overwhelming realization of the wanton unkindness which I had just given to the best friend Dicky and I have ever possessed.

She had pinned her faith and honor to Harry Underwood's sincerity of reformation. I had utterly disbelieved in it, had feared his presence in the same sector with Dicky. The news of today apparently had exploded her theory, had vindicated mine. I saw clearly—now that the excitement of the interview was gone—that I must have wounded her sorely by my bitter outburst against the man who had been her husband.

Useless to reason that my anxiety for Dicky had made me incapable of poise or thoughtfulness. I knew that Lillian, no matter what her anguish of spirit might be, never could wound a friend because of it.

A cold little fear seized me. Did I imagine it, or had the clasp of her arms when I had run into them, the sound of her voice, held only mechanical kindness instead of the warm affection she had always given me? I knew her keenness of perception, her rigid sense of justice. Had I wounded her beyond pardon?

I feared so, when a few moments later she came quietly back into the room, closing the door after her. She didn't look directly at me, and her voice held a casualness that was utterly foreign to her usual sympathetic warmth in times of stress.

What Madge Asked.

"Wouldn't you like to lie down for awhile?" she asked with careful courtesy. "Of course, you're not going back home until after dinner, and it will be an hour before Betty calls us."

For a moment I stood irresolute. What was best for me to do, accept her cue, and leave the thing between us in the grave in which she evidently had interred it, or bring up the question which she was so palpably ignoring?

I knew her horror of anything like a scene was equal to my own, and I dreaded the possibility of risking her displeasure without securing the pardon I craved. But my horror of myself was too great to go away from my friend without a word. I went up to her impetuously, and crushed her hands in mine, looking into her clear eyes with my own full of remorseful tears.

"I can't do anything, Lillian," I said passionately, "until you've forgiven me for that horrid speech of mine about Harry. I—I can't help thinking it"—I knew Lillian's honesty too well to try to disguise my real thought—"but you're in no way to blame, and it was mean and cowardly of me to say such a thing. Don't—don't let it make any difference between you and me. I couldn't—bear—it."

I was sobbing violently by this time, partly from real fear of Lillian's judgment, partly in nervous reaction from the strain of the day. I felt Lillian withdraw her hands from mine, wondered for one awful second if she meant to disregard my plea, then felt her arms around me, this time with all the old warmth in their loving clasp as she drew me to a seat beside her on one of the big couches, and soothed me until the force of my sob
