the party ascends the highest tree,— generally the spruce fir, which is easily climbed. But when a still lofter look out is wanted, a spruce fir is felled and haid against the trunk of some lofty pine, up which the explorer dambers until her reach-es the summit, and is enabled to survey the vast extent of forest around. From such a tree-top, like a mariner at the mast head upon the look-out for whales, (for indeed, the pine is the whale of the forest,) large "covered, whose towering tops may be seen for miles around. Such views, fill the bosom of the timber hunter with intense in-his treaure—his EI Dorado,—and they are beheld with peculiar and thrilling emo-tions. Todetail the process more minutely, we should observe that the man at the base marks the directions, indicated by a com-past which he holds in his hand,—the compass being quite as necessary in the wilderness as on the pathless ocean dout, the explorers retrace their steps, blaz-ing or notching the trees, so as to enable due the explorers retrace their steps, blaz-ing or notching the trees, so as to enable then the "clump" has been fairly made out, the explorers retrace their steps, blaz-ing or notching the trees, so as to enable then the return easily to the place ; and then they ruturn home, to await the spring season, when felling, rolling, and rafting commence with great vivacity. Permits or however, first obtained from the Sate, or fom the proprietors, before the loggers cattle, is hastily inocked together, it is usually in the form of a long 'booth or shed of the roughest description, covered with shingless and fir branches. The interior is divided into three compartments—" kitch-en," dining-room," and sleeping apart-ment, the bedtacas of which consist of mother-earth. When the occupants "turn in "for the aight, they merely throw off their outer garments, and they sleep there more soundly than many princes on their beis of down. The interior of the shanty, on wintry nights, is often a scene of mirth and jollity, and many long yarns about ad-ventures with deer, hears, wolves, and cat-smourts, are spus for the benefit of the listeners. Songs are sung; and many a cloud of tobacco is blown—for smoking scenes to be one of the necessary qualifica-tions of the river. The townster is one of the hardest worked of the lot, and his care for the cattle is unceasing—the success of the whole party depending greatly on his efficiency. We need not describe the de-tail of the logging operations they may easily be imagined.—The trees are select of, filled, chopped, barked rolled, and dragged, during a period of three months. Then the camp is broken up, the logs are remet to preserve his raft, and the creit-ing and dangerous work of river-driving begins.—The rafts float on, each superin-tended by a driver has constantly to be on the to be passed. Then the logs are anter to preserve his raft, and when he values at less rate, his own life. Sometimes days and weeks pass before a "jum can be cleared—the driver has constantly to be on the strong pull when all is ready. He have the torest part of the jam.
